

Durham E-Theses

Reading Joshua as Christian scripture

Earl, Douglas Scotohu

How to cite:

Earl, Douglas Scotohu (2008) Reading Joshua as Christian scripture, Durham theses, Durham University.
Available at Durham E-Theses Online: <http://etheses.dur.ac.uk/2267/>

Use policy

The full-text may be used and/or reproduced, and given to third parties in any format or medium, without prior permission or charge, for personal research or study, educational, or not-for-profit purposes provided that:

- a full bibliographic reference is made to the original source
- a link is made to the metadata record in Durham E-Theses
- the full-text is not changed in any way

The full-text must not be sold in any format or medium without the formal permission of the copyright holders.

Please consult the full Durham E-Theses policy for further details.

Reading Joshua as Christian Scripture

Douglas Scotohu Earl

PhD Thesis

The copyright of this thesis rests with the author or the university to which it was submitted. No quotation from it, or information derived from it may be published without the prior written consent of the author or university, and any information derived from it should be acknowledged.

University of Durham

Department of Theology and Religion

2008

1 8 DEC 2008

Reading Joshua as Christian Scripture

Douglas Earl

Abstract

The perception of historical and ethical difficulties associated with Joshua in the twentieth century have led to difficulties in appropriating it as Christian Scripture. I argue that from the perspective of cultural memory Joshua nonetheless has an important role as Scripture, but, moreover, that in engagement with patristic interpretation such difficulties call for Joshua to be read in a different way from that in which it has been since at least the time of Calvin onwards. I develop a way of reading based on recent anthropological approaches to myth, such as those of Victor Turner and Seth Kunin in particular. I combine this treatment of myth with Paul Ricoeur's approach to narrative hermeneutics and the hermeneutics of testimony to produce a reading of Joshua in dialogue with its reception and use in order to argue for a constructive contemporary means of reading Joshua as Christian Scripture.

Reading Joshua as Christian Scripture

Douglas Scotohu Earl

A thesis presented to the Department of Theology and Religion of the University of Durham for the degree of Doctor of Philosophy 2008

Contents

Section I

An introduction to the hermeneutics of reading Joshua as Christian Scripture

Chapter 1: Reading Joshua as Christian Scripture?	1
1.1 Introduction – a sketch of the problem	1
1.2 Cultural memory	3
1.3 The Old Testament in the Christian tradition	6
1.4 The nature of Scripture and how we learn to speak of God	10
 Chapter 2: Learning to speak of God through myth – approaching Joshua as myth	 12
2.1 An introduction to myth	12
2.2 Ideological, sociological and political approaches to myth	17
2.3 Psychological approaches to myth	20
2.4 Existential and symbolic approaches to myth	24
2.5 Structuralist approaches to myth	34
2.6 Reading Joshua with mythical perspectives	42
 Chapter 3: The hermeneutics of reading Joshua as Christian Scripture	 45
3.1 The hermeneutics of texts	46
3.2 The significance of testimony	53
3.3 The life of symbols	59
3.4 Summary	64

Section II

Making Joshua intelligible as discourse: Starting to read well

Chapter 4: Joshua as part of tradition(s)	67
4.1 The compositional history of Joshua	67
4.2 The deuteronomistic nature of Joshua	69
4.3 The priestly nature of Joshua	71
4.4 Summary – the significance of the deuteronomistic and priestly natures of Joshua	75
 Chapter 5: The genre of Joshua – codes of production and use of literary conventions	 78
5.1 Similarities between Joshua and ANE conquest accounts	78
5.2 Differences between Joshua and ANE conquest accounts	80
5.3 Summary	81

Chapter 6: Understanding the significance of חרם	83
6.1 Re-examining the ‘priestly-like’ approaches to חרם in the non-priestly literature	86
6.2 A mythical approach to the deuteronomistic חרם	96
6.3 Summary	102

Section III

Reading Joshua

Chapter 7: The text of Joshua	104
7.1 Differences in the textual witnesses to Joshua	104
7.2 The significance of the choice of text for Christian reading	109
7.3 Summary	110

Chapter 8: Reading Joshua	111
8.1 Josh. 1	111
8.2 Josh. 2	115
8.3 Josh. 3-4	118
8.4 Josh. 5:1-12	124
8.5 Josh. 5:13-15	129
8.6 Josh. 6	131
8.7 Josh. 7:1-8:29	137
8.8 Josh. 8:30-35	145
8.9 Josh. 9-10	146
8.10 Josh. 11-12	156
8.11 Josh. 13-21	161
8.12 Josh. 22	168
8.13 Josh. 23	174
8.14 Josh. 24	180

Chapter 9: Drawing it all together: Reading Joshua as Christian Scripture today	189
9.1 Joshua – challenging and constructing identity	189
9.2 Appropriating Joshua – the development and use of its symbols and mythemes	195
9.3 Appropriating Joshua – its development and use as an act of discourse as myth	203
9.4 The context and use of Joshua	222
9.5 Conclusion	226

Bibliography	230
---------------------	-----

List of tables

Table 4.1: Instances of distinctive deuteronomistic language	69
Table 4.2: Summary of deuteronomistic and priestly language in Joshua	74

Abbreviations

AB	The Anchor Bible
ABD	D.N Freedman (ed.), The Anchor Bible Dictionary (New York: Doubleday, 1992, 6 vols.)
ACA	K. Lawson Younger Jr., Ancient Conquest Accounts: A Study in Ancient Near Eastern and Biblical History Writing (JSOTSup 98) (Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1990)
ACCS	J.R. Franke (ed.), Ancient Christian Commentary on Scripture, Old Testament IV: Joshua, Judges, Ruth, 1-2 Samuel (Downers Grove: IVP, 2005)
ACW	Ancient Christian Writers
Adv. Haer.	Irenaeus, Adversus Haereses , in ANF 1
ANE	Ancient Near East(ern)
ANEP	J.B. Pritchard (ed.), The Ancient Near East in Pictures relating to the Old Testament (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 2 nd ed. with supplement: 1969)
ANET	J.B. Pritchard (ed.), Ancient Near Eastern Texts Relating to the Old Testament 3 rd ed. with supplement (Princeton, Princeton University Press, 1969)
ANF	A. Roberts & J. Donaldson (eds), Ante-Nicene Fathers (Buffalo: Christian Literature, 10 vols. 1885-1896, Reprint: Peabody: Hendrickson, 1994)
ARM	Archives Royales de Mari
ATR	Anglican Theological Review
AUSS	Andrews University Seminary Studies
BHS	K. Elliger and W. Rudolph (eds.) Biblia Hebraica Stuttgartensia (Stuttgart: Deutsche Bibelgesellschaft, 4 th ed. 1990)
BZ	Biblische Zeitschrift
BZAW	Beiheft zur Zeitschrift für die Alttestamentliche Wissenschaft

CAD	A.L. Oppenheim, et al , (eds), The Assyrian Dictionary of the Oriental Institute of the University of Chicago (Chicago: The Oriental Institute, 1956-)
CBQ	Catholic Biblical Quarterly
CD	K. Barth, Church Dogmatics (London: T&T Clark (15 vols.), paperback ed. 2004)
CoS	W.W. Hallo & K.L. Younger Jr. (eds.), The Context of Scripture (Leiden: Brill, 3 vols. 2003)
D	Deuteronomist
DH	Deuteronomistic History/Historian
DtrG/H	Deuteronomistic History
DJD	Discoveries in the Judean Desert
DtrN	Nomist redaction of DtrG/H
DtrP	Prophetic redaction of DtrG/H
EJ	C. Roth & G. Wigoder (eds), Encyclopaedia Judaica (Jerusalem: Encyclopaedia Judaica, 16 vols. 1971-1972)
H	H source
HALOT	L.Koehler and W.Baumgartner, The Hebrew and Aramaic Lexicon of the Old Testament (Leiden: Brill, rev. ed. 1994-2000)
HAT	Handbuch zum Alten Testament
Hom. Josh.	Origen, Homilies on Joshua (Trans. B. J. Bruce, ed. C. White: The Fathers of the Church 105) (Washington: The Catholic University of America Press, 2002)
Inst.	Calvin: Institutes of the Christian Religion (trans. F.L. Battles), (The Library of Christian Classics 20) (Philadelphia: The Westminster Press, 2 vols., 1960)
JAOS	Journal of the American Oriental Society
JBL	Journal of Biblical Literature

JCS	Journal of Cuneiform Studies
JSOT	Journal for the Study of the Old Testament
JSOTSup	Journal for the Study of the Old Testament Supplement Series
JSS	Journal of Semitic Studies
KBo	Keilschrifttexte aus Boghazköi
KRI	K. Kitchen, Ramesside Inscriptions, Historical and Biographical (Oxford, 1969-)
KTU	M. Dietrich, et al , eds, Keilalphabetischen Texte aus Ugarit einschliesslich der keilalphabetischen Text ausserhalb Ugarits. Teil 1 Transkription (AOAT 24/1) (Kevelaer: Butzon & Bercker 1976)
Life of Moses	Gregory of Nyssa, The Life of Moses (The Classics of Western Spirituality), trans. E. Ferguson & A.J. Malherbe (New York: Paulist Press, 1978)
LXX	Septuagint
LXX ^A	Greek text of the Old Testament, Codex Alexandrinus
LXX ^B	Greek text of the Old Testament, Codex Vaticanus
MDOG	Mitteilungen der Deutschen Orient-Gesellschaft
MI	Mesha Inscription
MT	Masoretic Text
NIDOTTE	W.A. VanGemeren (ed.), New International Dictionary of Old Testament Theology & Exegesis (Carlisle: Paternoster, 5 vols., 1997)
NAS	New American Standard Version
NET	New English Translation
NIV	New International Version
NJB	New Jerusalem Bible
NKJ	New King James
NLT	New Living Translation

NPNF	P. Schaff, et al (eds), A Select Library of the Nicene and Post-Nicene Fathers of the Christian Church (Buffalo: Christian Literature, 2 series, 14 vols. Each, 1887-1894, Reprint: Peabody: Hendrickson, 1994)
NRSV	New Revised Standard Version
OG	Old Greek recension of the Septuagint
OTL	The Old Testament Library
P	priestly source
PTMS	The Pittsburgh Theological Monograph Series
Quest. Josh.	Theodoret of Cyrus, 'Questions on Joshua' in The Questions on the Octateuch (The Library of early Christianity vol. 2), trans. R.C. Hill (Washington, The Catholic University of America Press, 2007), pp.260-307
RedD	Deuteronomistic redaction of Joshua
RedP	Priestly Redaction of Joshua
RS	Ras Shamra field numbers
SJOT	Scandinavian Journal of the Old Testament
ST	T. Gilby (ed.), Summa Theologiae , Latin text and English Translation (Blackfriars ed.) (London: Eyre & Spottiswoode, 60 vols. 1964-1974)
TDOT	G. Botterweck & H. Ringgren (eds), Theological Dictionary of the Old Testament (Grand Rapids, 1977-)
TOTC	Tyndale Old Testament Commentaries
WBC	Word Biblical Commentary
ZAW	Zeitschrift für die Alttestamentliche Wissenschaft

Unless stated otherwise all citations of the Hebrew text are taken from BHS, and have been devocalized.

I am grateful for the financial support of the AHRC for the final two years of this project.

No part of this thesis has previously been submitted by me for a degree in this or any other university. Material from the work of others has been acknowledged and quotations and paraphrases suitably indicated.

The copyright of this thesis rests with the author. No part from it should be published without the author's prior consent. Information from it should be acknowledged.

Section I

An introduction to the hermeneutics of reading Joshua as Christian Scripture

Chapter 1

Reading Joshua as Christian Scripture?

1.1 Introduction – a sketch of the problem

Throughout the church's history the Bible has been revered and understood to be trustworthy and true, being the inspired self-revelation of God to humanity.¹ This understanding of the nature of Scripture led to the privileging of its 'divine nature', with its 'human nature' often being obscured and eclipsed.

However, the rise of historical criticism drew attention to Scripture's very 'human' aspects, causing a re-evaluation of the nature of the material, which, coupled with the rise of historical consciousness and other trends in modernity in the 19th-20th centuries led to 'a great uncertainty of faith'. Scripture could no longer be assumed to be 'trustworthy and true' in a straightforward sense.² This was exacerbated by archaeological discoveries, such as the discovery of the ruins of Jericho, which whilst initially taken as a confirmation of the veracity of the biblical material in Joshua, was subsequently interpreted by Kathleen Kenyon as demonstrating a lack of veracity – the 'historical Jericho' had fallen centuries before the alleged fall of the 'biblical Jericho'.³ Parts of the

¹ Cf. 2 Tim. 3:16.

² Cf. CD III/1, p.82.

³ See T.A. Holland & E. Netzer, 'Jericho (place)', in ABD, vol. 3 pp.723-740, and J. J. Bimson, Redating the Exodus and Conquest (Sheffield: The Almond Press, rev. ed. 1981), pp.43ff for helpful summaries of the excavations at Jericho. Whilst I think that the work of John Bimson, and Peter James et al (Centuries of Darkness (London: Pimlico, 1992)) offers a serious challenge to the reconstruction of Israel's early history, work that does not appear to have been engaged with properly, I shall be arguing that Joshua's significance does not lie in its historical veracity. Therefore I shall leave the question of 'what happened' open.

Bible, such as Joshua, were understood to be inaccurate historically which undermined their 'truth' and authority.⁴

A further challenge arose in the late 20th century via rising ethical consciousness; a lack of 'ethical veracity' in texts such as Joshua highlighted again the 'human nature' of Scripture and called its trustworthiness and truth into question again at about the time when questions of historical veracity were becoming less important than they seemed several decades earlier. With the publication of works such as R.A. Warrior's essay on Joshua, in which he highlights the use made of Joshua by the Puritan emigrants to America to legitimate genocide,⁵ coupled with a rising global awareness of the atrocities of genocide, another blow to Joshua occurred that made it yet more difficult to assert that Joshua is in any sense 'trustworthy and true' as the word of God. By the close of the 20th century the perception of the 'human nature' had, generally speaking, eclipsed that of its 'divine nature'.

These historical and ethical issues have fuelled the basic hermeneutical problem, that Joshua is an Old Testament book. Historical and ethical issues aside, how does an Old Testament book continue to find significance in a Christian context theologically?

Thus there are three basic issues that sharply raise the question of whether an Old Testament text, of which Joshua is a parade example, is able to find any enduring significance, in a positive sense, in the contemporary Christian context in three ways. First, a theological question: can, and if so how, does an Old Testament text continue to find significance in a Christian context? Secondly, a historical question: can a foundational 'history-like' narrative that appears to lack veracity, even broadly construed, be seen as trustworthy and true in any sense? Thirdly, an ethical question: can an ethically problematic text continue to find Christian significance? Indeed, a student of

⁴ See e.g. G.W. Ramsey, 'If Jericho was not Razed, is our Faith in Vain?' in The Quest for the Historical Israel: Reconstructing Israel's Early History, (London: SCM, 1982), pp.107-124 for a basic discussion of some of the issues.

⁵ R.A. Warrior, 'Canaanites, Cowboys and Indians: Deliverance, Conquest, and Liberation Theology Today' in D. Jobling, et al. (eds), The Postmodern Bible Reader (Oxford: Blackwell, 2001), pp.188-194.

Ellen Davis asked her if there was any biblical text that one should actually ‘reject’,⁶ and it seems that Joshua might be a prime candidate. How might one discern whether or not Joshua does in fact have any continuing significance, positively speaking, today? Can one wholeheartedly read Joshua as Christian Scripture?

I would like to investigate two areas of research, a sociological one and a historical one, and consider them in theological perspective, in order to provide an opportunity to pause for reflection and reconfiguration of the problem before dealing with the specific difficulties that the theological, historical and ethical questions raise.

1.2 Cultural memory

The first area that I wish to explore is that of ‘cultural memory’, a fairly recent field of research in social anthropology. ‘Cultural memory’ is a phrase coined by Jan Assmann in his development of Maurice Halbwach’s work on memory in societies, and is a concept that he studies in the context of Ancient Israel amongst others.⁷ Independently of Assmann, Danièle Hervieu-Léger has also developed Halbwach’s work in relation to religion in modern societies using the concept of ‘chain of memory’.⁸

John Rogerson offers a helpful summary of cultural memory as developed by Assmann, before applying it to the Old Testament, a point that I will return to. He comments,

Corporate or cultural memory stretches back much further than individual memory. It can be located or perpetuated in ceremonies or customs or religious practices. While it depends on specialist individuals such as priests or scribes or the tellers of epics it embodies the interests of social groups, not individuals. Insofar as it is concerned with the past, it deals not with what modern scholars would call factual history, but with remembered history—a way of recalling the past which can change with the changing needs and situations of a given social group. This remembered history exists not because there is an interest in the past as such, but because the remembering enables a group to understand itself in the present and to generate hopes for the future.⁹

Importantly, Assmann contrasts cultural memory with communicative memory and collective, bonding memory (as he terms them) because cultural memory ‘includes the

⁶ E.F. Davis, ‘Critical Traditioning: Seeking an Inner Biblical Hermeneutic’ in ATR 82:4 (2000), pp.733-751.

⁷ J. Assmann, Religion and Cultural Memory (Stanford: Stanford UP, ET:2006).

⁸ D. Hervieu-Léger, Religion as a Chain of Memory (New Brunswick: Rutgers UP, ET:2000).

⁹ J.W. Rogerson, ‘Towards a Communicative Theology of the Old Testament’, in J.G. McConville & K. Möller (eds.), Reading the Law: Studies in Honour of Gordon J. Wenham (London: T&T Clark, 2007), pp.283-296, here p. 294.

noninstrumentalisable, heretical, subversive and disowned',¹⁰ and suggests that it is 'complex, pluralistic, and labyrinthine; it encompasses a quantity of bonding memories and group identities that differ in time and place and draws its dynamism from these tensions and contradictions.'¹¹

Danièle Hervieu-Léger argues that for religion to endure in the modern world it needs to have deep roots in traditions, through a 'chain of memory' in which 'individual believers become part of a community that links past, present and future members'. She argues that religion 'may be perceived as a shared understanding with a collective memory that enables it to draw from the well of its past for nourishment in the increasingly secular present.'¹² Interestingly, she argues that,

[T]he modern secular societies of the West have not, as is commonly assumed, outgrown or found secular substitutes for religious traditions; nor are they more "rational" than past societies. Rather, modern societies have become "amnesiacs," no longer able to maintain the chain of memory that binds them to their religious pasts. Ironically, however, even as the modern world is destroying and losing touch with its traditional religious bases, it is also creating the need for a spiritual life and is thus opening up a space that only religion can fill.¹³

She develops her hypothesis using contemporary French society, noting that the uncertainties created by the removal of the presence of memory in society

shows itself in a particularly acute form in the search for identity to which modern society is ill-suited to respond, lacking as it does the essential resource for identity of a memory held in common. ... The ever-increasing dislocation of this imaginative grasp ... forces society continually to reconstruct itself in new forms so as to ensure continuity for both the group and the individual. But without there being an organized and integrated social memory such reconstruction takes place in an entirely fragmentary way.¹⁴

She concludes that 'the religious reference to a chain of belief affords the means of symbolically resolving the loss of meaning that follows from heightened tension between the unrestrained globalization of social phenomena and the extreme fragmentation of individual experience,'¹⁵ and that, 'What clearly emerges here is the ambivalent character of religion in modernity, in which the traditional religions can only hold their own by

¹⁰ Assman, Religion, p.27.

¹¹ Ibid, p.29.

¹² Hervieu-Léger, Religion, from the cover.

¹³ Ibid, from the cover; cf. p.viii-ix. Indeed, she defines religion as 'a particular form of belief and one that specifically implies reference to the authority of a tradition' (p.4).

¹⁴ Ibid, p.142. She illustrates this phenomenon via the current French passion for genealogy, historical novels, French Heritage days, the taste for antiques and for traditional crafts, concluding that 'the passion commonly felt for everything concerned with the celebration of roots may be seen as the converse of the intensely felt sense of the loss of collective memory' (p.142).

¹⁵ Ibid, p.166.

tentatively exploiting the symbolic resources at their disposal in order to reconstruct a continuing line of belief for which the common experience of individual believers provides no support.’¹⁶

Taking Assmann and Hervieu-Léger together, an awareness of cultural memory is suggestive in three ways. First, granted the symbolic resources that Joshua has provided throughout the history of the church – such as the crossing of the Jordan, the collapsing walls of Jericho, the ‘salvation’ of Rahab and the promise of the land fulfilled – even if these now have a somewhat problematic nature, to seek to excise them from the tradition is likely to be a mistake which might contribute to the ‘collapse’ or fragmentation of the Christian tradition with a loss of a distinctive Christian identity. Secondly, material such as Joshua has provided the basis for our ‘God talk’, a point that I shall return to later. However, thirdly, whilst Hervieu-Léger’s approach would caution against the rejection of material such as Joshua from the Christian tradition, Assmann’s approach highlights the presence of ‘noninstrumentalisable, heretical, subversive and disowned’ material. In other words, whilst it may be important not to ‘reject’ the book of Joshua from our ‘cultural memory’, this does not imply that it has, of necessity, to be ‘used’; rather, it is a call to respect and recognize its presence in the tradition. Such a conclusion is, perhaps, not particularly novel in the Christian tradition.¹⁷ For example, Gregory of Nyssa in his first homily on Ecclesiastes writes,

In all the other scriptures [i.e., other than Ecclesiastes], whether histories or prophecies, the aim of the book also includes other things not wholly of service to the Church. Why should the Church be concerned to learn precisely the circumstances of battles, or who became the rulers of nations and founders of cities, which settlers originated where, or what kingdoms will appear in time to come, and all the marriages and births which were diligently recorded, and all the details of this kind which can be learned from each book of scripture? Why should it help the Church so much in its struggle towards its goal of godliness?¹⁸

¹⁶ Ibid., p.176.

¹⁷ Throughout this introduction I will draw upon figures in the Christian tradition in order to indicate the way in which the approach that I am developing is genuinely Christian and properly theological even though I shall make extensive use of contemporary anthropology. This use of anthropology should be construed as being conducted within a wider theological frame of reference, something that I hope will be clear.

¹⁸ Homily I, trans. S.G. Hall & R. Moriarty in S.G. Hall (ed), Gregory of Nyssa: Homilies on Ecclesiastes: An English Version with Supporting Studies (Berlin: Walter de Gruyter, 1993), pp.33-34.

In other words, there is precedent within the tradition for an approach to the Old Testament that cherishes it as Scripture but does not require its 'utilization' or 'application' in any straightforward way.

Thus given the apparent impasse reached with regard to Joshua when its significance is discussed in hermeneutical terms, simply on empirical sociological grounds, consideration of cultural memory would suggest that the 'abandoning' Joshua is unwise. Cultural memory provides one with a frame of reference that resists the rejection of Joshua whilst not forcing its 'application'.

1.3 The Old Testament in the Christian tradition

The second area that I would like to investigate is the way in which the Old Testament has in fact been used within the Christian tradition. The simple sketch above, whilst indicating (all too crudely and briefly) the erosion of trust and confidence in Scripture, and Joshua in particular, only reflects the development of the understanding of the nature of Scripture in the modern and post-modern era. Might attention to the pre-modern era make the debate look rather different?

I would like to begin by considering some of Origen's comments on biblical interpretation in his On First Principles. He comments,

But if in every detail of this outer covering, that is, the actual history, the sequence of the law had been preserved and its order maintained, we should have understood the scriptures in an unbroken course and should certainly not have believed that there was anything else buried within them beyond what was indicated at a first glance. Consequently the divine wisdom has arranged for certain stumbling-blocks and interruptions of the historical sense to be found therein, by inserting in the midst a number of impossibilities and incongruities, in order that the very interruption of the narrative might as it were present a barrier to the reader and lead him to refuse to proceed along the pathway of the ordinary meaning: and so, by shutting us out and debarring us from that, might recall us to the beginning of another way, and might thereby bring us, through the entrance of a narrow footpath, to a higher and loftier road and lay open the immense breadth of the divine wisdom.

And we must also know this, that because the aim of the Holy Spirit was chiefly to preserve the connexion of the spiritual meaning, both in the things that are yet to be done and in those which have already been accomplished, whenever he found that things which had been done in history could be harmonised with the spiritual meaning, he composed in a single narrative a texture comprising both kinds of meaning, always, however, concealing the secret sense more deeply. But wherever the record of deeds that had been done could not be made to correspond with the sequence of the spiritual truths, he inserted occasionally some deeds of a less probable character or which could not have happened at all, and occasionally some which might have happened but in fact did not. Sometimes he does this by a few words, which in their bodily sense do not appear capable of containing truth, and at other times by inserting a large number. ...

All this, as we have said, the Holy Spirit supervised, in order that in cases where that which appeared at the first glance could neither be true nor useful we should be led on to search for a truth deeper down and needing more careful examination, and should try to discover in the scriptures which we believe to be inspired by God a meaning worthy of God. ...

*And so it happens that even in them the Spirit has mingled not a few things by which the historical order of the narrative is interrupted and broken, with the object of turning and calling the attention of the reader, by the impossibility of the literal sense, to an examination of the inner meaning.*¹⁹

Thus Origen was well aware that there were ‘historical difficulties’ in Scripture, an observation that was not uncommon in the early patristic writers, but gradually became obscured in the tradition.²⁰ But rather than dismissing texts with historical difficulties as ‘untrue’, or seeking to offer a plausible reconstruction of history, or a harmonization of texts, Origen saw these difficulties as a hermeneutical cue to seek the text’s significance somewhere other than in the ‘literal’ or ‘historical’ sense.²¹

But a similar move occurs in relation to ethical difficulties. For example, in Augustine’s discussion of literal interpretation in On Christian Doctrine he discusses criteria for determining where Scripture is to be read figuratively,²² and suggests, ‘Whatever there is in the word of God that cannot, when taken literally, be referred either to purity of life or soundness of doctrine, you may set down as figurative. Purity of life has reference to the love of God and one’s neighbour; soundness of doctrine to the knowledge of God and one’s neighbour.’²³ In other words, an ‘ethical difficulty’ with a scriptural text – a text that does not have reference to love of neighbour for example, is a hermeneutical cue to promote its significance somewhere other than in the ‘literal’ sense. Whilst one might think that Augustine would understand Joshua’s significance figuratively, he does not. In Questions on Joshua, commenting on Josh. 11:14 Augustine states, ‘One should not at all ¹⁹ On First Principles, Latin Text, IV.ii.9, in G.W. Butterworth (trans), Origen: On First Principles (Gloucester: Peter Smith, 1973), pp. 285-287, emphasis added.

²⁰ See e.g. R.W. Southern’s discussion of the rise of work on harmonization of the biblical materials in Scholastic thought (R.W. Southern, ‘The Sovereign Textbook of the Schools: the Bible’ in Scholastic Humanism and the Unification of Europe (Oxford: Blackwell, 1995) vol. 1, pp.102-133).

²¹ Defining what is meant by the ‘literal sense’ is surprisingly difficult even if it seems intuitively clear. The problem is highlighted in David Dawson’s comments on Hans Frei’s work: ‘Frei’s concept of the Bible’s literal sense, never simple, changed over the course of his career. His usual claim, developed in a number of early writings, was that the Bible’s literal sense is constituted by the way its realistic, true-to-life stories aptly depict the way things are regarded as customarily happening in the world. Late in his career, Frei characterized the literal sense more as a consensus decision by the Christian community about how to read certain texts than as an inherent feature of certain kinds of literary narratives.’ (J.D. Dawson, Christian Figural Reading and the Fashioning of Identity (Berkeley: University of California Press, 2002), p.143).

²² On Christian Doctrine, 3.5-11 (NPNF 1.2, pp.1168-1174).

²³ On Christian Doctrine, 3.10.14 (NPNF 1.2, p.1172).

think it a horrible cruelty that Joshua did not leave anyone alive in those cities that fell to him, for God himself had ordered this.²⁴ Thus although Augustine does not reject the ‘literal sense’ of Joshua, his ethical-theological hermeneutic paves the way within the tradition to do so. However, returning to Origen, in his Homilies on Joshua ethical difficulties in a scriptural text function for him rather like historical difficulties – such difficulties are a hermeneutical cue to seek the significance of the text somewhere other than the literal sense. In his homily on Josh. 10:20-26 he remarks,

But Marcion and Valentinus and Basilides and the other heretics with them, since they refuse to understand these things in a manner worthy of the Holy Spirit, “deviated from the faith and became devoted to many impieties,” bringing forth another God of the Law, both creator and judge of the world, who teaches a certain cruelty through these things that are written. For example, they are ordered to trample upon the necks of their enemies and to suspend from wood the kings of that land that they violently invade.

And yet, if only my Lord Jesus the Son of God would grant that to me and order me to crush the spirit of fornication with my feet and trample upon the necks of the spirit of wrath and rage, to trample on the demon of avarice, to trample down boasting, to crush the spirit of arrogance with my feet, and, when I have done all these things, not to hang the most exalted of these exploits upon myself but upon his cross. Thereby I imitate Paul, who says, “the world is crucified to me,” and, that which we have already related above, “Not I, but the grace of God that is in me.”

But if I deserve to act thus, I shall be blessed and what Jesus said to the ancients will also be said to me, “Go courageously and be strengthened; do not be afraid nor be awed by their appearance, because the Lord God has delivered all your enemies into your hands.” If we understand these things spiritually and manage wars of this type spiritually and if we drive out all those spiritual iniquities from heaven, then we shall be able at last to receive from Jesus as a share of the inheritance even those places and kingdoms that are the kingdoms of heaven, bestowed by our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ, “to whom is the glory and the dominion forever and ever. Amen!”²⁵

What is interesting is that this ethical-theological hermeneutic operated precisely in contrast to the hermeneutic of the Gnostic ‘heretics’ who asserted that the hermeneutically significant level of the Old Testament was found in the ‘literal sense’ of the text. The Old Testament functioned as Scripture in the emerging ‘orthodox’ Christian church precisely through ‘spiritual reading’ where historical and ethical problems were understood to exist in the text as cues to such a mode of reading. Indeed, this kind of spiritual or allegorical interpretation was typical of much of the early church.²⁶

²⁴ Augustine, Questions on Joshua 16 (ACCS, p.67. Cf. also Questions on Joshua 10-11 in ACCS, p.46).

²⁵ Hom. Josh. 12.3, pp.123-124.

²⁶ See F.M. Young, Biblical Exegesis and the Formation of Christian Culture (Cambridge: CUP, 1997) for discussion of the nature of such interpretation, and differences between the Alexandrian and Antiochene traditions. Origen is typical here, at least in the Alexandrian tradition, of these kind of hermeneutical moves. For example, in The Life of Moses Gregory of Nyssa suggests, ‘Do not be surprised at all if both things—the death of the firstborn and the pouring out of the blood—did not happen to the Israelites and on that account reject the contemplation which we have proposed concerning the destruction of evil as if it were a fabrication without any truth. For now in the difference of the names, Israelite and Egyptian, we perceive the difference between virtue and evil.’ (II.100, p.77). It is interesting that whilst interpreters

Whilst allegorical interpretation is often regarded as lacking hermeneutical control, it is interesting to note how ‘stable’ and consistent the allegorical readings of Joshua were – for example with regard to Rahab and to Jericho. This suggests that Joshua was read within a tradition that in fact offered a hermeneutical control and guide to its ongoing significance. Joshua was not read in isolation from the remainder of what emerged as Christian Scripture, and its reading was guided by the developing Christian tradition. Indeed, the importance of tradition, and the regula fidei as guiding interpretation was developed by Irenaeus, again in opposition to the Gnostics.²⁷ Thus we find an awareness of the importance of the reception of a text and the context in which it is used within the early Christian tradition – scriptural texts are not ‘freely floating’ objects to be interpreted in isolation from each other and the tradition. Irenaeus’ response to conflicting interpretations was not to seek to determine what a given text ‘really meant’ through appeal to a ‘presuppositionless’ or ‘scientific’ exegesis of a text, but rather to demonstrate that the significance of a text, as a Christian text, was bound up with its position and reception within a particular tradition – or one might say ‘interpretative community’.

In summary then, we see an awareness of historical and ethical difficulties in Old Testament narratives, and that this was not seen as a problem but as a hermeneutical cue to seek a ‘spiritual meaning’. Moreover, just as the development of hermeneutical theory in the 20th century highlighted the importance of the reader and their context for the interpretation of a text, so we have seen an awareness of the importance of the interpretative tradition associated with the reception of a scriptural text, and how such a within the Antiochene tradition are keen to ‘uphold’ the literal or historical sense of Scripture, in interpreters who seek any contemporary ‘application’ it is effectively the ‘spiritual’ sense that is used, although it is described as typology (see e.g. Theodoret of Cyrus, Quest. Josh, preface (p.261); 2.2 (pp.267-269); 12 (pp.285-287)). However, in Calvin we find a very different response to the historical and ethical difficulties. For example, he comments on Josh. 10:18, ‘The enemy having been completely routed, Joshua is now free, and, as it were, at leisure, to inflict punishment on the kings. In considering this, the divine command must always be kept in view. But for this it would argue boundless arrogance and barbarous atrocity to trample on the necks of kings, and hang up their dead bodies on gibbets. It is certain that they had lately been raised by divine agency to a sacred dignity, and placed on a royal throne. It would therefore have been contrary to the feelings of humanity to exult in their ignominy, had not God so ordered it. But as such was his pleasure, it behoves us to acquiesce in his decision, without presuming to inquire why he was so severe.’ (J. Calvin, Commentaries on the Book of Joshua, (Grand Rapids: W.B. Eerdmans, ET:1949), pp.157-158). Ironically Calvin is closer to the Gnostic heretics here than to the ‘orthodox’ interpreters.

²⁷ Cf. e.g. Adv. Haer. 1.8.1.

tradition guides the ‘good’ interpretation of a scriptural text as Christian Scripture. This is not to say that a univocal ‘correct’ meaning was imposed on any given text for a plurality of interpretations is evidenced, even if they cluster around a ‘stable core’. The tradition sought to foster good interpretation of biblical texts used as Christian Scripture.²⁸

Thus there is a rich theological resource within the Christian tradition that is fully cognizant of the historical and ethical difficulties with Joshua, but uses them as a cue for a certain kind of interpretation that offers guidance for what it means to read Joshua as Christian Scripture well. Thus the contemporary interpreter of Joshua as Christian Scripture may, and perhaps ought to, refuse some of the interpretative moves imposed by modernity and post-modernity, even if the interpreter may also benefit greatly from modern and post-modern biblical scholarship in order to understand Joshua better, as we shall see.

1.4 The nature of Scripture and how we learn to speak of God

In the light of historical criticism one cannot simply return to patristic interpretation of the Old Testament and re-assert it. On the one hand, it may need some correction for in places it seems implausible, particularly in the details, even if it points towards a good ‘frame of reference’ for reading difficult texts. On the other hand, we have become more aware of the human dimensions of Scripture; one can no longer assert that it is ‘divine revelation’ in any straightforward sense, and thus automatically trustworthy and true.²⁹ Thus we need to consider the nature of the material that we have in front of us in Scripture – in Joshua.

²⁸ Cf. W.S. Green’s comments on Jewish midrash (‘Romancing the Tome: Rabbinic Hermeneutics and the Theory of Literature’, in Semeia 40 (1987), pp.147-168) in which he argues that although different interpretations are given in any midrash-compilation, they do, however, operate within a ‘narrow thematic range’. The various explanations are thus mutually reinforcing rather than conflicting, and alleged multiple meanings are multiple variations on a single meaning. By providing multiple warrants for what is essentially the same message, it restricts interpretative options (pp.162-163); ‘The rabbinic interpretation of scripture, therefore, was anything but indeterminate or equivocal. Rather, it was an exercise—and a remarkably successful one—in the dictation, limitation, and closure of what became a commanding Judaic discourse.’ (p.165).

²⁹ In other words, one must face the possibility that Marcion was correct.

Indeed, Rowan Williams suggests that '[t]heology ... is perennially liable to be seduced by the prospect of bypassing the question of how it learns its own language'.³⁰ He suggests that revelation is associated with 'the dialectical process of its historical reflection and appropriation'³¹ and that "'revelation' includes, necessarily, 'learning about learning'".³² In other words, it can be all too easy to simply appeal to Scripture as 'divine revelation' in order to trump the demanding questions that occur in relation to it. Since it is no longer possible to simply assert the divine nature of Scripture,³³ one must engage with this process of 'learning about learning'. If we return to where we began, cultural memory, situated in a theological context, may be a helpful place to situate a discussion of how we 'learn about learning' with reference to that which we might wish to call 'revelation'. How in the church is its cultural memory formed, and how is the life of the community shaped via scriptural texts; how can we 'learn about our learning'? I would like to suggest that whilst it needs to be stripped of its negative connotations, 'myth' is a helpful category for reflecting upon this learning process when situated in a theological context, and in the context of cultural memory.

³⁰ R. Williams, 'Trinity and Revelation' in On Christian Theology (Oxford: Blackwell, 2000), pp.131-147, here, p.131.

³¹ Ibid., p.132.

³² Ibid., p.135.

³³ Whilst one cannot simply assert it, one need not deny it either. A pointer to a way forward to the 'recovery' of the divine nature of Scripture might be found in Thomas Aquinas in his development of the somewhat neglected notion of concursum with regard to causality (see e.g. Summa Contra Gentiles III.2, and cf. 1 Thess. 2:13). This is not the place to develop this idea in detail in relation to Scripture, save to say that the notion of concursum allows one to speak, simultaneously, of the human and divine nature of the material that is in front of us.

Chapter 2

Learning to speak of God through myth - approaching Joshua as myth

2.1 An introduction to myth

It is generally through ‘important narratives’ that people, both individually and as communities gain a sense of identity and learn to speak about themselves and of what is of ‘ultimate importance’. I would like to suggest that it is through these that cultural memory is negotiated and constructed,¹ and by studying the nature of what have been called histories, stories and myths that we can ‘learn about our learning’. Whilst in modern Western thought there has been a tendency to distinguish between these three genres in terms of content, value and function, I would like to reconsider these distinctions. For want of a better term, and it is a very inadequate term given its history of use, I would like to suggest that our learning and shaping of identity may be considered using the category of ‘myth’, when suitably construed, for it will include history, story and other symbolic resources.²

‘Myth’ is a category that anthropologists have used to describe the means by which people learn to shape their identities and lives as aspects of a ‘cultural memory’. Recent anthropological studies of myth highlight its importance as an ineluctable pan-cultural phenomenon that helps people and societies to make sense of the world and orientate themselves within it, with ‘myth’ having many functions and meanings in this regard.³ The 19th and 20th centuries have witnessed the growth of a plethora of approaches to

¹ Cf. A. Kirk, ‘Social and Cultural Memory’, in A. Kirk & T. Thatcher (eds), Memory, Tradition, and Text: Uses of the Past in Early Christianity (Semeia Studies 52) (Atlanta: SBL, 2005), pp.1-24 who discusses cultural memory in these terms. However, the approach that I shall develop indicates that the way in which texts shape identity occurs slightly differently from the way in which Kirk suggests.

² Jan Assmann has coined the term ‘mnemohistory’, i.e., history as it is remembered, as the ‘proper way of dealing with the working of cultural memory’ (Moses the Egyptian: The Memory of Egypt in Western Monotheism (Cambridge MA: Harvard University Press, 1997), p.15). However, I think that this is too narrow given that cultural memory relies upon symbolic resources other than ‘history’ (cf. chapter 1).

³ R.A. Segal (Myth: A Very Short Introduction (Oxford: OUP, 2004), pp.56-57) notes that Mircea Eliade argued this, even if myth is ‘camouflaged’ today. Segal goes on to consider how the stories of John F. Kennedy Jr. and George Washington might be said to reflect contemporary myth.

myth.⁴ But the term ‘myth’ has a problematic history of use, and current usage of the term by anthropologists is varied. Often, and particularly in biblical studies, it is used pejoratively, especially when used in a non-technical fashion, being associated with either primitive science or false consciousness – essentially that which is naively ‘untrue’. Theorists of myth in the 19th and 20th centuries sought to reify ‘myth’, providing accounts of the essence of myth according to differing understandings of human nature, seeking to address the origin, content or function of myth as they understood it. Recognizing the problems of approaching what has been termed ‘myth’ in these ways, towards the end of the 20th there has been a tendency either to abandon the search for an essentialist definition of myth, or to combine varied approaches to provide a ‘thick description’ of myth, with the assumption being that previous approaches have identified an aspect of something called ‘myth’.

One such theorist seeking a thick description is William Doty. He defines myth via the following statement:

A mythological corpus consists of (1) a usually complex network of myths that are (2) culturally important (3) imaginal (4) stories, conveying by means of (5) metaphoric and symbolic diction, (6) graphic imagery, and (7) emotional conviction and participation, (8) the primal, foundational accounts (9) of aspects of the real, experienced world and (10) humankind’s roles and relative statuses within it.

Mythologies may (11) convey the political and moral values of a culture and (12) provide systems of interpreting (13) individual experience within a universal perspective, which may include (14) the intervention of suprahuman entities as well as (15) aspects of the natural and cultural orders. Myths may be enacted or reflected in (16) rituals, ceremonies, and dramas, and (17) they may provide materials for secondary elaboration, the constituent mythemes (mythic units) having become merely images or reference points for a subsequent story, such as a folktale, historical legend, novella, or prophecy.⁵

Despite its attractiveness, the difficulty with Doty’s approach is that it reflects a juxtaposition and conflation of various approaches that, in places, reflect essentially different understandings of human nature and myth that may be mutually incompatible.⁶ Whilst more work is therefore required for this ambitious project if it is to be convincing, this definition as it stands has heuristic value since it is suggestive of the kind of ‘objects’ that we are talking about in connection with myth. It indicates the complex and rich variety of ways in which one’s worldview, identity and existence are shaped. Therefore, if Joshua can be shown to have sufficient resonance with the kind of materials identified by this definition, then it is suggestive of the value of seeking to understand Joshua, and crucially, its significance and use, in terms of what these theories suggest that myth is, and how its significance is manifested.

⁴ See A. von Hendy, The Modern Construction of Myth (Bloomington: Indiana UP, 2002) for detailed treatments of the major approaches to myth in the 19th and 20th centuries.

⁵ W.G. Doty, Mythography: The Study of Myths and Rituals (Tuscaloosa: University of Alabama Press, 2nd ed. 2000), pp.33-34. In general his work appears to be well received in reviews and summaries of the field, although there are some important criticisms, discussed below. See R.A. Segal, review of Mythography: The Study of Myths and Rituals (Tuscaloosa: University of Alabama Press, 1986), by W.G. Doty, in JAAR 56 (1988), pp.149-152 (review of 1st ed.); L. Coupe, review of Mythography: The Study of Myths and Rituals (Tuscaloosa: University of Alabama Press, 2nd ed. 2000), by W.G. Doty, in Religion 32.2 (2002), pp.166-168; L.A. Northup, ‘Myth-placed Priorities: Religion and the study of Myth’ in Religious Studies Review 32:1 (2006), pp.5-10.

I will sketch very briefly how Joshua does indeed resonate with this description in order to suggest that it is a reasonable approach to pursue.⁷ First, Joshua is clearly culturally important and part of a network of myths that are culturally important by virtue of their inclusion in Scripture. Secondly Joshua is a story (I will leave the ‘imaginal’ aspect of it to one side for the moment) that involves symbol, such as the symbolic nature of crossing the Jordan (Josh. 3-4),⁸ of Jericho (Josh. 6),⁹ and of the characters of Rahab (Josh. 2) and Achan (Josh. 7),¹⁰ that invites emotional conviction and participation (e.g. Josh. 23-24). Thirdly, Joshua is a foundational account for Israel that establishes statuses, values and norms for society, such as through the stories of Rahab and Achan, the law (e.g. Josh. 8:30-35) and the distribution of the land (Josh. 13-21). Fourthly, Joshua narrates suprahuman intervention, such as the parting of the waters of the Jordan (Josh. 3-4) and the battle in Josh. 10, and, finally, it provides material for further elaboration, as one finds in the Psalms (e.g. Ps. 114), the NT (e.g. Acts 7, Jas. 2:20-26) and the Christian tradition (e.g. Origen’s homilies). This very brief sketch indicates that Joshua appears to have significant resonances with material that is termed mythical, and hence that analyzing Joshua from the perspective of myth may be fruitful. Joshua’s significance is likely to be

⁶ See e.g. Robert Segal’s critique in his review of Mythography.

⁷ The details of this will be filled out in chapter 8.

⁸ Cf. L.D. Hawk, Joshua (Berit Olam) (Collegeville: The Liturgical Press, 2000), pp.59-61.

⁹ Cf. R.D. Nelson, Joshua (OTL) (Louisville: Westminster John Knox Press, 1997), p.91.

¹⁰ Cf. F.A. Spina, The Faith of the Outsider: Exclusion and Inclusion in the Biblical Story (Grand Rapids: W.B. Eerdmans, 2005), pp.52-71.

illuminated by the ways in which these theories of myth suggest that myths find their significance.¹¹

There may indeed be difficulties with Doty's definition as it stands. But what is attractive about his approach is that it seeks to work from what might be said to constitute a 'family resemblance' of objects that might be called 'myth', rather than from pre-understandings of the nature of humanity that are specific to certain disciplines, and tailoring one's theory of myth to fit accordingly. He recognizes that different theorists of myth have produced partial accounts of how people and communities shape their existence and orientate themselves in the world from the perspective of different disciplines in the humanities, and that some synthesis is required. As Richard Walsh puts it,

Mythographers are ruthless tailors fitting their subjects to their Procrustean beds. That the academy's various methods and subject areas are themselves such a priori patterns is most obvious to those outside the methods and areas in question. ... [W]e will surely object to myth's reduction to mere psychology, sociology, economics, or so forth unless one of those areas is our own comfortable bed.¹²

It is too ambitious a project to seek to develop an adequate definition of myth. But if one is to heed Doty and Walsh's comments on the one hand, and Doty's critics on the other, perhaps one may start by considering whether various approaches to myth, used in turn, that appear fitting with a theological anthropology might indicate ways of understanding Joshua that illuminate some aspects of Joshua and its reception and use that it would be difficult to discern otherwise. This avoids the difficulty of defining myth adequately, or of forcing our understanding of Joshua or myth into a Procrustean bed.¹³ It is a less ambitious approach that makes no general claims concerning the nature of myth, or of Joshua, but an approach that might help one to understand Joshua better, and thus how to read and use it well. Thus there may be some theories of myth that are not appropriate to use to analyze Joshua either because they address different kinds of material, or because they may reflect a (theologically or anthropologically) poor interpretation of human nature.

¹¹ There has been surprisingly little work done on Joshua 'as myth'. One study is N.A Soggie (Myth, God, and War: The Mythopoetic Inspiration of Joshua (Lanham: University Press of America, 2007)) which considers the development of the text of Joshua from a psychological approach to myth. His thesis has rather different concerns in view from mine.

¹² R.G. Walsh, Mapping Myths of Biblical Interpretation (Playing the Texts 4) (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2001), p.54. Cf. Ernst Cassirer's comments, 'Every scholar still found in myth those objects with which he was most familiar. At bottom the different schools saw in the magic mirror of myth only their own faces. The linguist found in it a world of words and names—the philosopher found a primitive philosophy—the psychiatrist a highly complicated and interesting neurotic phenomenon.' (The Myth of the State (New Haven: Yale UP, 1946), p.6.

¹³ Cf. John Rogerson's concluding comments in what is still, probably, the major work on myth and the Old Testament: '[M]yth has been used in so many senses in Old Testament interpretation that it would be impossible and undesirable to try to find a single definition for the term, and to force all relevant material or evidence into the mould that resulted.' (J.W. Rogerson, Myth in Old Testament Interpretation (BZAW 134) (New York: Walter de Gruyter, 1974), p.174).

So whilst different theories of myth often identify rather different classes of objects as myth, or seek to address rather different questions relating to their function or use, it is quite appropriate to analyze Joshua using a variety of approaches, with each perspective being potentially illuminative provided that Joshua 'intersects' sufficiently with the particular approach in question. This might lead to the criticism that one is using theories simply because they work – but the point of a good theory is precisely that it does work, and theories are as good as the explanatory power that they provide for empirical data. So, for example, whereas some theories stress myth as consciously shaping the human or the society, whilst others regard it as shaping at a subconscious level, there is no necessary inconsistency in applying both theories provided that one grants that people can be shaped both consciously and subconsciously. The task is, then, to discern when a particular approach is appropriate and leads to good interpretation of the material, even if it is only partial.

Given my aim of reading Joshua as Christian Scripture, I shall locate this work on myth in a theological frame of reference; in other words, granting descriptive and explanatory power to the anthropological approaches whilst not granting them autonomy; anthropological theory does not provide the ultimate level of explanation, whilst theology does not bypass anthropology. Thus I do not wish to develop a solely phenomenological approach, but a theological approach that is informed by and in dialogue with anthropology.

However, placing anthropological approaches to myth in a theological context can be as illuminative and 'empowering' as it is restricting, since, for example, theological accounts of human nature traditionally identify the importance of both ‘rational’ and ‘emotive’ aspects to human nature, and the need for their development and transformation. Thus it is likely that ‘Christian myths’ will seek to shape both aspects of the person, and thus one would expect such ‘myths’ to have both intellectual and emotional aspects. Thus one would expect that a text such as Joshua ought to be analyzed through approaches to myth that stress its intellectual aspects – such as those identified by Claude Lévi-Strauss in structuralism, for example, combined with approaches that stress emotive aspects, such as identified by Victor Turner, for example, in order to give a sufficiently full account of a work such as Joshua, even if Lévi-Strauss would deny the importance of emotive aspects to myth as he views myth. Moreover, inasmuch as a theological anthropology identifies humans as being societal in nature, sociological and political approaches to myths are likely to be appropriate tools to use. Thus a theological anthropology invites a broadening, an ‘opening up’ of possibilities for interpretation, as much as it might be said to represent a narrowing and constricting influence.

I would now like to explore these kind of approaches to myth since they would seem to be potentially fruitful for interpreting Joshua. This is not to suggest that only these approaches to myth might contribute to interpreting Joshua, but that together, they are, nonetheless, likely to provide a good description of Joshua. Indeed, I will not develop psychological approaches to myth in any depth, being a vast and controversial field, although it is an area of work on myth that has influenced the other approaches that I wish to consider, and so has an indirect impact on the approach to Joshua that I wish to develop. I shall, however, make some brief comments on psychological approaches below.

2.2 Ideological, sociological and political approaches to myth

Joshua is certainly ideological literature (I do not use the term in any pejorative sense here), being originally concerned with shaping the identity of the nation of Israel, and thus has political significance.¹⁴ Moreover, Joshua continues to be used and discussed in political and colonial / postcolonial debate, and its significance is sometimes construed in these terms today, leading Michael Prior, for example, to engage in a moral critique of the Bible.¹⁵ But ideological approaches to myth are by no means uniform – one finds very different understandings of the relationship between myth and ideology in the works of Karl Marx, George Sorel and Bronislaw Malinowski for example.¹⁶

¹⁴ See L.L. Rowlett, Joshua and the Rhetoric of Violence: A New Historicist Analysis (JSOTSup 226) (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1996) and R.B. Coote, ‘The Book of Joshua’, in The New

Engels describes ideology as ‘a process accomplished by the so-called thinker consciously, it is true, but with a false consciousness. The real motive forces impelling him remain unknown to him ... As all action is mediated by thought, it appears to him to be ultimately based upon thought’,¹⁷ representing the kind of view that has led to many pejorative construals of ideology expressed as myth. Theologically speaking, such a ‘hermeneutic of suspicion’ highlights the need for discernment in appropriating what is presented in ‘scriptural myths’. Humanity is distorted by sin, and this distortion may be reflected in some of the motives that led to the production of the texts that we now have as Scripture. However, these texts have persisted in use, indeed becoming Scripture at some remove from their original context, suggesting that God has, nonetheless, been discerned as in some sense speaking through these texts.¹⁸ Broadly speaking I suggest that a ‘hermeneutic of trust’ towards scriptural texts is, theologically speaking, to take precedence over a ‘hermeneutic of suspicion’, even if discernment of proper use that is not based upon a false consciousness is an ongoing process.

Interpreter's Bible (Nashville: Abingdon, 1998), vol.2, pp.555-719 for two readings of Joshua that major upon its political dimensions. Our analysis will, however, run in a rather different direction from Rowlett and Coote's, readings which are rather strongly dependent upon a particular historical reconstruction of the origins of the book and particular interpretations of such origins.

¹⁵ M. Prior, The Bible and Colonialism: A Moral Critique (The Biblical Seminar 48) (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1997). See also D. Mbuwayesango, ‘Joshua’ in D. Patte (ed), Global Bible Commentary (Nashville: Abingdon Press, 2004), pp.64-73 for a reading of Joshua with postcolonial concerns in view. Furthermore, for the political implications of Joshua in regard to the modern state of Israel see N. S. Ateek, Justice and only Justice: A Palestinian Theology of Liberation (Maryknoll: Orbis Books, 1989), esp. pp.75ff (discussed in chapter 3) and G.R. Tamarin, The Israeli Dilemma: Essays on a Warfare State (Rotterdam: Rotterdam University Press, 1973) esp. pp.183-190. Tamarin's closing comment, written in an epilogue following in the wake of the political difficulties that the publication of his research caused are suggestive; ‘I never dreamt that I would become the last victim of Joshua's conquest of Jericho...’ (p.190).

¹⁶ See e.g. von Hendy, Myth, pp.278-303 for a summary of ideological treatments of myth (in which he includes structuralism).

¹⁷ Cited in von Hendy, Myth, p.280.

¹⁸ Thus there are two issues here – the expression of an ideology that motivated the production of a text and the ideology associated with its ongoing use. The ideology associated with its production may or may not reflect the ideology of later use.

Moreover, in relation to Sorel, Robert Segal suggests that how much his theory ‘actually illuminates any myth beyond labelling it as such ... is not easy to see.’¹⁹ In other words, having labelled something as ‘ideology’, which may or may not be understood pejoratively, some approaches might not take the interpreter any further. Granted, Joshua is ideological – but then what follows from this?

However, some theories of myth more aimed at the use of myth in society may supply further understanding of Joshua. Malinowski, for example, notes the importance of myth as a charter for society, and that it is a ‘reality lived’ and a ‘hard-working, extremely important cultural force’, or ‘active force’,²⁰ and that ‘myth comes into play when rite, ceremony, or a social or moral rule demands justification, warrant of antiquity, reality, and sanctity’²¹ being an ‘ever-present, live actuality’.²² In other words, myths locate various aspects of society and life in society as rooted in an ancient past in order to grant their legitimacy. Furthermore, Abizadeh suggests that in relation to the way that national myths function to fashion the identity of a national group, the correspondence between the narrated myth and ‘actual events’ is often ambiguous,²³ but again, by setting the myth in a foundational time it grants it legitimacy, being something that the society can construct itself upon. I shall return to the ambiguous relation of myth to history later, but for now I simply wish to observe the tendency to set narratives that shape or reinforce the existence of societies in a prototypical time in order to grant their legitimacy and form the basis of a cultural memory. This might raise the possibility that Joshua may not be particularly concerned with conquest per se, but may take this as its setting and reflect some aspects of the memory of Israel’s early existence.

¹⁹ Segal, Myth, p.129.

²⁰ B. Malinowski, ‘Myth in Primitive Psychology’ in Magic, Science and Religion and other Essays (Westport: Greenwood Press, 1984), pp.93-148, here pp.97-101.

²¹ Ibid, p.107.

²² Ibid, p.126.

²³ A. Abizadeh, ‘Historical Truth, National Myths and Liberal Democracy: On the Coherence of Liberal Nationalism’ in The Journal of Political Philosophy, 12:3 (2004), pp. 291-313. Cf. D. Miller, On Nationality (Oxford: OUP, 1995), esp. pp.35-39, who also notes that such myths are rarely ‘complete falsehoods’ (p.38).

2.3 Psychological approaches to myth

I would like to begin my brief consideration of psychological approaches to myth²⁴ with René Girard's work, being an apparently 'obvious' starting point for reading Joshua as it is concerned with 'sacred violence'. Girard understands the anthropological characteristic that is most fundamental to human behaviour to be mimesis. Mimesis occurs in the imitation of the desire within two people for the same 'object', a desire that escalates into a rivalry, becoming a conflict for the sake of conflict as the importance of the object of desire dissolving in the process. The two rivals become mirror images of each other, 'mimetic doubles'. When played out at the societal level others gradually join the conflict, conflict that can reach epidemic proportions and threaten the existence of a society. When this 'contagion' of mimetic rivalry reaches a boiling point, peace mysteriously emerges: The 'mimetic contagion' is 'scapegoated' onto a victim, who is then deemed responsible for all the social chaos. The victim is killed by 'mob violence', and peace emerges, although for peace to emerge requires that the lynching of the victim is not seen for what it is.²⁵ Jeffrey Carter elaborates on Girard's theory:

Societies ... have discovered a means to end the cycle of violence caused by mimetic desire. They have discovered the "mechanism of the surrogate-victim," the practice of transferring the interior violence of the group (social chaos, sense of sin, evil, impurity) to a surrogate, a scapegoat, who can be expelled from (i.e., killed by) the community. This scapegoat, Girard notes, must be unable to retaliate and thereby extend the cycle of violence; it must be somewhat marginalized from the group, not fully a member but not completely foreign either. Domesticated animals, non-human community members, are ideal victims. Active in this mechanism is a "mob mentality," one that blames some innocent figure for social evil and that believes salvation (the return of stability and order) will come from eliminating that figure. By virtue of an unconscious process, "bad violence" threatening the very order of society is removed with an act of "good violence." Curiously, Girard continues, when the mechanism of the surrogate victim works, and the community is essentially saved from itself, members may look back and understand the victim as a savior. Whoever was at first worthy of blame is later remembered as beneficent, as the being who helped (perhaps even voluntarily—choosing to die) the community overcome a dangerous crisis. Being the locus of both good and bad violence, the victim acquires an air of mystery, of awesome power, potentially dangerous but ²⁴ Many other psychological approaches could be considered here, but space prevents this. For example, from a Jungian perspective Edward Edinger summarizes Joshua thus: 'Psychologically the Promised Land can be seen as an area of the unconscious which the imperative of individuation requires to be assimilated by the ego. This area is specifically assigned to the ego by the Self but still must be conquered by the efforts of the ego. The land is not vacant but occupied. It is studded with fortified cities; that is, it contains defended unconscious complexes which must be resolved before it can be assimilated. Joshua's conquest of Canaan is a symbolic picture of how to deal with the unconscious and its hostile complexes under certain circumstances.' (The Bible and the Psyche: Individuation Symbolism in the Old Testament (Toronto: Inner City Books, 1986), p.65). There are some resonances here with Origen's spiritual reading of Joshua. Another psychological approach that relates to the development of the text is that of Soggie's (Myth, God, and War).

²⁵ A. Marr, 'Violence and the Kingdom of God: Introducing the Anthropology of René Girard', in ATR 80:4 (1998), pp.590-603, here, pp.590-591.

generous, transcendent but nearby—all characteristics, in short, of the sacred. Girard concludes, the surrogate victim becomes, for the community, a divine being, a power to be worshipped, a founding ancestor who continues to protect and provide, bless and punish.²⁶

Thus if the scapegoating is successful, it leads to a paradoxical and ambiguous representation of the scapegoat in subsequent myths via a process that Girard terms ‘double transference’.²⁷

But this is not the case in Joshua. Indeed, Girard notes that sometimes ‘the myth fails’; the violence does not become sacralised and ‘double transference’ fails to occur.²⁸ In this case, he suggests that such texts describing the events be termed ‘texts of persecution’, rather than myths, being texts that have undergone a process of demythologization, texts that sit between ‘archaic mythical representations and radical demystifications of collective violence’. They are texts that are provided by the persecutors that distort, in characteristic ways, the character of those persecuted.²⁹ Is Joshua a ‘text of persecution’ then? Whilst Girard has written on a number of biblical texts, I am not aware of any discussion of Joshua,³⁰ although others have sought to apply his work to Joshua.³¹

Gordon Matties also considers the applicability of Girard’s theory to reading Joshua.³² He notes,

According to Girard, these foreigners [the Canaanites, etc.] are presented “in terms of a ‘fictive’ foreign threat.” In this case, therefore, the insider-outsider dynamic in the plot of Joshua is not at all about shaping the identity of a community in front of the text; rather, it obscures a conflict behind the text in a generative act of violence. Reading Joshua with Girard’s interests in mind would not simply describe how the narrative functions to shape corporate identity in the present, but would uncover how the hidden violence inherent in the community is linked, through the narrative, to original violence against the outsider.³³

²⁶ J. Carter, ‘René Girard’ in Understanding Religious Sacrifice: A Reader (London: Continuum, 2003), pp.239-275, here, p.240.

²⁷ C. Fleming, René Girard: Violence and Mimesis (Cambridge: Polity Press, 2004), p.62.

²⁸ Cf. Segal’s comments on Girard’s approach to myth: ‘For him, literature is the legacy of myth, which recounts, albeit in distorted form, the ritualistic sacrifice of an innocent victim, who can range from the most helpless member of society to the king. ... Instead of functioning to explain the killing, as other myth-ritualists would assume, myth for Girard functions to hide it – and thereby to preserve the stability of society.’ (R.A. Segal, Theorizing about Myth (Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1999), p.45).

²⁹ Fleming, Girard, pp.102-103.

³⁰ Likewise, Gordon Matties notes that with regard to Girard’s work, ‘Joshua has been one of those texts that has been avoided’ (‘Can Girard help us to read Joshua?’, in W.M. Swartley, Violence Renounced: René Girard, Biblical Studies, and peacemaking (Telford: Pandora Press, 2000), pp.85-102, p.85).

³¹ E.g. Coote, ‘Joshua’, esp. pp.617-618. Whilst Coote uses Girard’s categories, I am not convinced that it is a Girardian reading as such. Rather, it seems that Girard’s categories suit Coote’s rhetoric.

³² G.H. Matties, ‘Girard’

³³ Ibid, p.91.

He goes on to note that a reading of Joshua from a Girardian perspective is unable to account for the cultic framing of the narrative, the ‘exceptional outsiders’ (such as Rahab), the problems of geographical boundary definition,³⁴ and, moreover, the story of Achan. Indeed, Rahab and Achan’s stories occupy much narrative space in Joshua, indicating they are a major concern – but Girard’s theory does not account for this. Thus Matties concludes,

Girard’s approach seems unable to do two things: first, it does not pay enough attention to all details of a text; second, in its focus on the world hidden behind the text, it does not clearly address reception of the text by later readers in front of the text. With respect to both concerns, Girard’s hermeneutic seems to offer a limited understanding of the formative and transformative function of the narrative. What it does well, however, is to offer critical tools by which to offer a critique of the violent mechanisms so often justified by texts like Joshua.³⁵

Thus, leaving aside questions of the validity of Girard’s theory generally, it appears that it does not help one to read Joshua.

However, Girard’s work helpfully draws attention to the broader psychological issues of projection and desire in Joshua. Regarding projection, one might be able to understand the portrayal of the Canaanites as a ‘symbolic’ group onto whom those characteristics that are deemed irreconcilable with Israelite group identity are projected.³⁶ Whilst Joshua says little about the characteristics of the Canaanites, etc., in its cultural (and canonical) context such a projection, and its content, is clear (e.g. Lev. 18:24; Deut. 9:5, Zech. 14:21).³⁷ But then if this is indeed an important way in which the identity of God’s people was constructed, it is then interesting to consider the nature of the projected

³⁴ Ibid, p.95.

³⁵ Matties, Girard, p.95.

³⁶ Cf. Doty, Mythography, p.63 (cited above) on myth as projecting identity, and also Hawk, Joshua, p.xxviii for a similar suggestion, based upon his structuralist analysis. Also P.D. Stern (The Biblical herem: A Window on Israel’s Religious Experience (Brown Judaic Studies 211) (Atlanta: Scholar’s Press, 1991)) notes that a practice like חרם ‘reflects a certain mythicization of the enemy as the monster of chaos’ (p.224).

³⁷ In Zech. 14:21 פְּנֵעִי probably functions as an idiom for ‘merchant’. But Izak Cornelius suggests that the term retains a negative image when used in this sense (‘פְּנֵעִי’, in NIDOTTE, vol.2, p.669). Thus if the term does function as an idiom and carries a negative sense, it probably serves to strengthen the idea that ‘Canaanite’ functions as a symbol or ‘root metaphor’ in a pejorative fashion, as it shows how the metaphorical sense of ‘Canaanite’ is developed in a particular (negative) direction in connection with traders – i.e., bad traders are ‘like’ Canaanites.

undesirable characteristics, those that define the ‘outsider’, something that structuralist analysis, that I will discuss below, often does not consider.³⁸

Turning to desire, writing on Joshua, Daniel Hawk suggests that Within the context of the story, Israel’s desire is clearly for the land. Canaan is “a land flowing with milk and honey” (Num. 14:8; Deut. 11:9), offering rest, security, and abundance. Life in the land represents “the goal and desire of the people of God” ... Yet more than a destination, it promises a profound fulfillment—Israel in the land is Israel identified, coherent, and completed.

Life in the land is also life with Yahweh, who gives the land (Josh. 1:2-5; 13:6 and confirms the promise by removing those who stand as obstacles to Israel’s fulfillment (Josh. 8:18; 10:11; 11:6; 23:5,9-10).³⁹

Indeed, the desire for נָחַם (rest) in Joshua (e.g. 1:13,15; 21:44; 22:4; 23:1), a special quality of life which represents the goal of and consummation of Joshua’s campaign,⁴⁰ seems particularly important. Joshua can be said to be expressive of a desire for a particular quality of life, a desire that Butler notes is eschatologised in the prophetic materials (Isa. 14:3,7; 11:20; 28:12; 32:18, cf. Dan. 12:13).⁴¹ In other words, one might say that, psychologically speaking, Joshua is not so concerned with conquest per se, but with the desire for living peacefully at rest in the land as YHWH’s people, a desire that has clear eschatological dimensions, but is a rest achieved through struggle and conflict. Thus ‘spiritual’ or ‘typological’ readings of Joshua that have taken the possession of the Promised Land to be a ‘type’ of heaven⁴² do in fact reflect that which Joshua is expressive of, but using the symbolism of a new context. In other words, some of the ³⁸ Cf. Paul Ricoeur’s comments: ‘Structuralism, to my mind, is a dead end the very moment when it treats any “message” as the mere “quotation” of its underlying “code.” This claim alone makes structural method structuralist prejudice. Structuralism as ideology starts with the reversal in the relation between code and message which makes the code essential and the message unessential. And it is because this step is taken that the text is killed as message and that no existential interpretation seems appropriate for a message which has been reduced to a pure epiphenomenon of the “codes.” ... I call dead end not all structural analysis, but only the one which makes it irrelevant, or useless, or even impossible to return from the deep-structures to the surface-structures.’ (P. Ricoeur, ‘Biblical Hermeneutics’, in Semeia 4 (1975), pp.29-148, here, p.65).

³⁹ L.D. Hawk, Every Promise Fulfilled: Contesting Plots in Joshua (Louisville: Westminster John Knox Press, 1991), p.141.

⁴⁰ Nelson, Joshua, p.31. It is interesting that the root is also used in Josh. 3:13; 4:3,8 & 6:23, places where perhaps שָׁמַח or נָחַם would have been more natural, which might point to the importance of נָחַם as a Leitwort in Joshua.

⁴¹ T.C. Butler, Joshua (WBC 7) (Waco: Word Books, 1983), p.21.

⁴² E.g. in Calvin: ‘But in Scripture sometimes God, in conferring all these earthly benefits on them, determined to lead them by his own hand to the hope of heavenly things. ... [I]n the earthly possession [the Israelites] enjoyed, they looked, as in a mirror, upon the future inheritance they believed to have been prepared for them in heaven’ (Inst. II.11.1, pp.450-451).

instincts of traditional Christian readings may have been correct, even if they were poorly articulated.

2.4 Existential and symbolic approaches to myth

Robert Segal suggests that '[b]ecause myth concerns the human experience of the world, not to say the deepest anxieties experienced in the world, it would seemingly have existential import'.⁴³ Moreover, Doty suggests that myths provide us with projective models of roles and of aspirations toward becoming 'something other than what we are, of ways of imagining new possibilities as to who we are', whilst providing a sense of a person's role in the universe.⁴⁴ This is reminiscent of Rudolf Bultmann's classic existential approach to myth in which he stated that, 'The real purpose of myth is not to present an objective picture of the world as it is, but to express man's understanding of himself in the world in which he lives. Myth should be interpreted not cosmologically, but anthropologically, or better still, existentially.'⁴⁵ I would now like to base my discussion of symbolic and existential aspects of myth on the work of two figures who have been, in rather different ways, very influential in the study of myth from this perspective, Paul Ricoeur and Victor Turner.

Paul Ricoeur

'Symbol' is a concept that is as problematic as 'myth', perhaps because discussions of symbol and myth often occur together.⁴⁶ Indeed, Louis Dupré suggests that there is a 'dialectical relation between myth and symbol', where symbols 'need the verbal interpretation of the myth' and 'the symbol is the exegesis of the myth'.⁴⁷ I would like to use Paul Ricoeur's work on symbol, myth and narrative, work which spanned several decades and reflected, as he put it, a journey from existentialism to the philosophy of language⁴⁸ as the basis for a discussion of symbols and of existential approaches to myth.

⁴³ Segal, Myth, p.118.

⁴⁴ Doty, Mythography, pp.72-73.

⁴⁵ R. Bultmann, 'New Testament and Mythology', in H-W. Bartsch (ed.), Kerygma and Myth (London: SPCK, ET 1953), vol.1, p.10.

⁴⁶ See J.W. Heisig, 'Symbolism' in M. Eliade (ed.), The Encyclopedia of Religion (New York: Simon & Schuster Macmillan), vol. 13, pp.198-208 for a summary of approaches to symbol.

⁴⁷ L. Dupré, Symbols of the Sacred (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2000), pp.91-92.

⁴⁸ Cf. von Hendy, Myth, pp. 306-307.

Whilst there were developments in his thinking, Ricoeur retained a 'rich' understanding of symbols and myth throughout his career; for Ricoeur symbols discover rather than invent, reflecting the 'capacity of the cosmos to signify'; whilst symbols and myths require hermeneutics and interpretation, this is grounded in the 'sacredness of nature'.⁴⁹ Andrew von Hendy suggests that Ricoeur's approach 'is our finest theory of myth that confronts the century's linguistic turn and yet maintains its roots in the sacred'.⁵⁰ So Ricoeur's account may be theologically attractive, for one can construe his position as expressive of a doctrine of creation in which the world is a place that is 'graced' and symbolizes the divine.

In his early work Ricoeur suggests that the symbol conceals in its aim a double intentionality. Take the "defiled," the "impure." This significant expression presents a first or literal intentionality that, like every significant expression, supposes the triumph of the conventional sign over the natural sign. Thus, the literal meaning of "defilement" is "stain," but this literal meaning is already a conventional sign; the words "stain," "unclean," etc., do not resemble the thing signified. But upon this first intentionality there is erected a second intentionality which, through the physically "unclean," points to a certain situation of man in the sacred which is precisely that of being defiled, impure. The literal and manifest sense, then, points beyond itself to something that is like a stain or spot. Thus, contrary to perfectly transparent technical signs, which say only what they want to say in positing that which they signify, symbolic signs are opaque, because the first, literal, obvious meaning itself points analogically to a second meaning which is not given otherwise than in it ... This opacity constitutes the depth of the symbol, which, it will be said, is inexhaustible. ...

I cannot objectify the analogical relation that connects the second meaning with the first. It is by living in the first meaning that I am led beyond it itself.⁵¹

Moreover, regarding the relationship between myth and symbol Ricoeur remarks, 'I shall regard myths as a species of symbols, as symbols developed in the form of narrations and articulated in a time and a space that cannot be co-ordinated with the time and space of history and geography according to the critical method'.⁵² This, it seems, is perhaps an unnecessarily restrictive view of myth, something that I shall return to below. But Ricoeur's account of symbol needs careful nuancing, as it is open to misconstrual. Jacques Waardenburg observes that ⁴⁹ P. Ricoeur, Interpretation Theory: Discourse and the Surplus of Meaning (Fort Worth: The Texan Christian UP, 1976), pp.62-63; cf. von Hendy, Myth, p.309.

⁵⁰ von Hendy, Myth, p.313.

⁵¹ P. Ricoeur, The Symbolism of Evil (Boston: Beacon Press, ET: 1969), p.15. Cf. also Sandra Schneider's helpful discussion on symbol (S.M. Schneiders, The Revelatory Text (Collegeville: The Liturgical Press, 2nd ed. 1999), pp.33-40).

⁵² Ricoeur, Symbolism, p.18.

Anthropologists have shown the tremendous importance of the cultural tradition and context in which symbols occur. In order to understand a symbol, these should be thoroughly known since they influence heavily the choice, concrete form, and meaning of symbols and since they throw light on the need for symbolic expression at all in the given circumstances.

Sociologists have stressed that symbols must be generally accepted by a group, community, or society in order to persist and that there must be a certain consensus on their meaning for them to be effective.⁵³

Whilst one might think that this account differs significantly from Ricoeur's 'rich' account, in fact it does not, for Ricoeur states elsewhere that 'I demonstrated the non-existence of the naturally symbolic, that a symbolism only functions within an economy of thought, within a structure'.⁵⁴ In other words symbols have a societal or contextual aspect, and require interpretation, even if ultimately they are grounded in the 'sacredness of nature'.

For Ricoeur symbols (and hence myths) contain a surplus of signification and meaning,⁵⁵ and he suggests that 'a symbol cannot be exhaustively treated by conceptual language' - symbols thus giving rise to endless exegesis.⁵⁶ Von Hendy suggests that for Ricoeur symbols are always mediated by language, where symbol is fused with myth, and hence that 'symbol is always mediated by narrative'.⁵⁷ Thus in Ricoeur's later work there is a shift to discourse analysis, and he develops the idea that 'discourse produces a "surplus of meaning," in the disclosure of "a world that constitutes the reference of the text"'.⁵⁸ Despite a shift from symbol and myth to metaphor and narrative, von Hendy observes, correctly I think, that narrative and myth 'may express something much nearer to identity than Ricoeur's historical separation of them has allowed him to face up to',⁵⁹ reflecting my observation above that Ricoeur's approach to myth per se is not only unnecessarily restrictive, but too restrictive. Thus it seems appropriate to read a text such as Joshua from the perspective of Ricoeur's work on both narrative and myth – and allow both perspectives to illuminate each other – without worrying unduly about questions of classification.

⁵³ J. Waardenburg, 'Symbolic Aspects of Myth' in A.M. Olson (ed.), Myth, Symbol and Reality (Notre Dame: University of Notre Dame Press, 1980), pp.41-68, here, pp.45-46.

⁵⁴ P. Ricoeur in 'Claude Lévi-Strauss: A Confrontation', in New Left Review 1/62 (Jul-Aug 1970), pp.57-74, here p.63.

⁵⁵ Ricoeur, Interpretation, p.55.

⁵⁶ Ibid, 57.

⁵⁷ von Hendy, Myth, pp.309-310.

⁵⁸ Ibid, pp.308-309, cf. Ricoeur, Interpretation, p.92

⁵⁹ von Hendy, Myth, pp.312.

As narrative Joshua discloses a world – the ‘world of the text’ that is the reference of the text, whose ‘referential claim is nothing other than the claim to redescribe reality’.⁶⁰ In other words, viewed from this perspective, the narrative of Joshua seeks to picture a world that redescribes reality, and as an act of discourse one may understand Joshua to be an invitation to existentially enter this ‘strange new world’ and allow it to affect one’s own – it is a narrative concerned with conversion and transformation. But this world requires interpretation, and given the problematic nature of the material in Joshua at the ‘literal level’ this is no easy task. But there is a ‘surplus of meaning’ in discourse such as Joshua, manifested where the ‘world of the text’ is appropriated within the ‘world of the reader’. This is a ‘revelatory’ process:

why call it revelatory? ... Here truth no longer means verification, but manifestation, i.e. letting what shows itself to be. What shows itself in each instance a proposed world, a world I may inhabit and wherein I can project my ownmost possibilities. ... And the intended implicit reference of each text opens onto a world, the biblical world ... The proposed world that in biblical language is called a new creation, a new Covenant, the Kingdom of God, is the “issue” of the biblical text unfolded in front of this text.⁶¹

This idea of ‘manifestation’ is important for Ricoeur, and has some affinities with Barth and Wittgenstein’s attempts to move beyond modernist concerns and metaphysical dilemmas regarding verification and certainty.⁶² I shall return to these questions in chapter 3, where I shall develop notions of ‘manifestation’ and ‘testimony’. But as narrative Joshua shows a ‘proposed world’ that one can chose to enact (or not) in ‘the real world’, in an existential sense, by a process of ‘conversion’ through the imagination. But how does one discern the way in which one ought to allow oneself to be ‘converted’ by a text like Joshua?⁶³ Or, to use Ricoeur’s language, in what sense might one say – and indeed can one say - that the world that Joshua depicts is a picture of the world of the ⁶⁰ P. Ricoeur, ‘The Narrative Function’, in Semeia 13 (1978), pp.177-202, here, pp.194-195.

⁶¹ P. Ricoeur, ‘Toward a Hermeneutic of the Idea of Revelation’, in P. Ricoeur (ed. L.S. Mudge), Essays on Biblical Interpretation (London: SPCK, 1981), pp.73-118, here pp.102-103.

⁶² Cf. M.I. Wallace, The Second Naiveté: Barth, Ricoeur, and the New Yale Theology (Studies in American Biblical Hermeneutics 6) (Georgia: Mercer UP, 1990); N.B. MacDonald, Karl Barth and the Strange New World within the Bible: Barth, Wittgenstein, and the Metadilemmas of the Enlightenment (Paternoster Biblical and Theological Monographs) (Carlisle: Paternoster, 2000).

⁶³ Indeed, Robin Parry suggests that for Ricoeur ‘[e]xactly how the “worlds” interact seems to be less than fully clear’ (Old Testament Story and Christian Ethics: The Rape of Dinah as a Case Study (Paternoster Biblical Monographs) (Bletchley: Paternoster, 2004), p.17). I shall try to develop this, in particular using the work of Victor Turner, discussed below.

Kingdom of God, even if it is imperfect? And where do its imperfections lie? Granted that it is part of the Old Testament, it is likely that the picture will need ‘perfecting’.

However, there is one common difficulty that I wish to deal with now concerning the relationships between fiction, history, myth and truth. In ‘The Narrative Function’ Ricoeur discusses at length the nature of ‘historiographical’ and ‘fictional’ narratives, problematizing the distinction between them, arguing on the one hand, that ‘history’ requires ‘emplotment’ and interpretation through a narrative framework, and on the other, that fictional narratives are grounded in historical existence. Crucially he argues that both history and fiction refer to human action, although they do so on the basis of two different referential claims. Only history may articulate its referential claim in compliance with rules of evidence common to the whole body of science. In the conventional sense attached to the term “truth” by the acquaintance with this body of science, only historical knowledge may enunciate its referential claim as a “truth”-claim. But the very meaning of this truth-claim is itself measured by the limiting network which rules conventional descriptions of the world. This is why fictional narratives may assert a referential claim of another kind, appropriate to the split reference of poetic discourse. This referential claim is nothing other than the claim to redescribe reality according to the symbolic structures of the fiction. And the question, then, is to wonder whether in another sense of the words “true” and “truth,” history and fiction may be said to be equally “true,” although in ways as different as their referential claims.⁶⁴

Thus describing a narrative as ‘fiction’ is not to say that it is ‘untrue’. Likewise theorists of myths have, from various perspectives, shown the ambivalent relationships between ‘history’, ‘myth’ and ‘truth’.⁶⁵ For example, Seth Kunin remarks, ‘The [biblical] narratives are given an historical framework; nonetheless they seem to work in the same way as mythological material.’⁶⁶ Conversely, accounts of ‘history’ can also be symbolic, with historical events construed symbolically with existential importance.⁶⁷ The issue at stake with regard to the biblical narratives is thus not that of historical veracity, but of whether they paint a good, fitting or faithful (even if imperfect) portrait of ‘the Kingdom of God’. So with Barth one may say that the idea that the Bible declares the Word of God only when it speaks historically is one which must be abandoned, especially in the Christian Church. One consequence of this misunderstanding was the great uncertainty of faith which resulted from an inability wholly to escape the impression that many elements in the Bible have the nature of saga, and an ignorance of where and how to draw the line which marks off what is finally historical and therefore the true Word of God. But in other cases ⁶⁴ Ricoeur, ‘Narrative Function’, pp.194-195.

⁶⁵ See e.g. above on national myths, and also e.g. S.D. Kunin, We Think What We Eat: Neo-structuralist analysis of Israelite Food Rules and Other Cultural and Textual Practices (JSOTSup 412: London: T&T Clark, 2004), pp.20-22. I shall return to the significance of ‘history’ in Western modernity below.

⁶⁶ Ibid, p.20.

⁶⁷ Schneiders, Revelatory Text, pp.36-37.

it led to a rigid affirmation that in the Bible, as the Word of God, we have only “historical” accounts and no saga at all - an affirmation which can be sustained only if we either close our eyes or violently reinterpret what we see. In other cases again it resulted in an attempt to penetrate to a “historical” kernel which is supposed to give us the true, i.e., “historical” word of God - the only trouble being that in the process it was unfortunately found that with the discarding of saga we do lose not only a subsidiary theme but the main point at issue, i.e., the biblical witness. We have to realise that in all three cases the presumed equation of the Word of God with a “historical” record is an inadmissible postulate which does not itself originate in the Bible at all but in the unfortunate habit of Western thought which assumes that the reality of a history stands or falls by whether it is “history.”⁶⁸

Returning now to symbol, Daniel Hawk’s comments on the Jordan crossing demonstrate how attention to symbol is illuminative for Joshua:

The crossing itself is an event highly symbolic of Israel’s transformation from a disordered to an ordered people. The narration of the event has a mythic quality, and its etiological elements in particular sanction and reinforce the symbolic network which constitutes Israel’s perception of reality. By crossing the Jordan, Israel moves from wilderness—the place of chaos—to the promised land—the place of order.

In and through the myth, “land” becomes a cipher for a total social order. The move into the land is nothing short of that creative change from chaos to ordered cosmos. ...[⁶⁹]

By crossing the Jordan, Israel enters a bounded place and leaves the vast expanse of the wilderness. The transformation is made possible by Yahweh, “frame-maker, boundary-keeper and master of transformations” ... who, represented by the Ark, stands between chaos and ordered existence. The narrative thus accentuates the liturgical elements of the episode in order to focus the reader’s attention on the symbolic significance of the boundary being traversed. The priests, who oversee Israel’s maintenance and traversing of boundaries, stand, appropriately, in the middle of the border-region to mediate journey of the entire people from wilderness to promised land. Extensive preparations are undertaken to ensure that the crossing is made in an orderly and integrated manner (3:1-13), and this is precisely what is done. Throughout the episode, the ostensive plot depicts the Jordan crossing in terms of wholes and boundaries. Thus Israel as a people has crossed over into a new, ordered existence with Yahweh (who confirms the transformation with a miraculous stoppage of the water).⁷⁰

But symbols, metaphors, and myths, whilst initially having great creative power and the ability to give rise to endless exegesis, can, and often do, become ‘tired’ or ‘dead’,⁷¹ or, as Doty puts it, they ‘become locked into single-meaning codes, where each term “stands for” only one meaning’.⁷² Indeed Waardenburg suggests that when symbols are used in sacred myths ‘the symbolization used in a myth can become so strong that not only is the

⁶⁸ CD III/1, p.82. For the move away from history and the importance of Barth see MacDonald, Karl Barth. MacDonald suggests that during the Enlightenment there was a shift away from the classic Christian paradigm of ‘faith seeking understanding’ to one of ‘faith requiring justification’.

⁶⁹ See L.L. Thompson, ‘The Jordan Crossing: šdqot Yahweh and World building’, in JBL 100/3 (1981), pp.343-358.

⁷⁰ Hawk, Every Promise, p. 95.

⁷¹ Cf. S. McFague, Metaphorical Theology: Models of God in Religious Language (Philadelphia: Fortress Press, 1982), p.41.

⁷² Doty, Mythography, p.52.

referent of the myth and symbol absolutized but the symbolic instrument itself becomes sacralized and consequently absolutized.’⁷³ This process can be described as the ‘tiring’, ‘rationalizing’ or ‘objectification’ of myths.⁷⁴ Crucially then, ‘myths’, such as Joshua,⁷⁵ that are expressed as ‘history-like’ narratives will tend to lose their proper existential significance through a process in which there is a shift in the perception of the location of their significance, being read in a different way, where a rather different ‘world of the text’ is construed, becoming ‘historicized’. In this, the importance of the myth’s existential character may be obscured. For example, Claude Lévi-Strauss notes that

Historicized myths are well-known throughout the world; a particularly striking example is the mythology of the Zuni indians of the South Western USA, which has been ‘historicized’ (on the basis of material which is not so historicized) by native theologians in a way comparable to that of other theologians on the basis of the ancestral myths of Israel.⁷⁶

Waardenburg suggests that one way of ‘liberating’ a ‘tired myth’ is to assimilate the myth in question to a new myth that has wider claims and possibilities with regard to the interpretation of reality.⁷⁷ But this process, of the assimilation of a myth into other myths, is in fact something that is inherent to myth when considered as part of a network of myths that shapes the life of a community. For example, Lévi-Strauss comments that

A mythic system can only be grasped in a process of becoming; not as something inert and stable but in a process of perpetual transformation. This would mean that there are always several kinds of myths simultaneously present in the system, some of them primary (in respect of the moment at which the observation is made) and some of them derivative.⁷⁸

These observations regarding ‘objectification’ or ‘historicization’ coupled with the notion of ‘surplus of meaning’ or ‘endless exegesis’ have important implications for understanding the significance, reception and use of Joshua. In the Christian tradition one can track the ‘transformation’ or ‘assimilation’ of Joshua as it was read in the light of the New Testament materials in, say, Origen’s Homilies on Joshua. Combining Joshua with,

⁷³ Waardenburg, ‘Symbolic Aspects’, p.57. Cf. his comments a little later, where he notes that making an implicit myth explicit is a kind of objectification of the myth, and a degree of rationalization (p.59).

⁷⁴ Ibid, p.56; Doty, Mythography, pp.138-140.

⁷⁵ For convenience of expression I shall refer to Joshua and to other biblical and post-biblical material as ‘myth’ even though I have noted the difficulties of reifying the concept of ‘myth’ and thus of finally identifying any object as such.

⁷⁶ C. Lévi-Strauss in ‘Claude Lévi-Strauss: A Confrontation’, in New Left Review 1/62 (Jul-Aug 1970), pp.57-74, here p.63. Cf. also Jean-Pierre Faye’s comments (ibid), p.67.

⁷⁷ Waardenburg, ‘Symbolic Aspects’, p. 56.

⁷⁸ C. Lévi-Strauss, From Honey to Ashes (New York: Harper and Row, ET:1973), p.354.

for example, Eph. 6 gave rise to a powerful, existential development of the symbolic nature of Joshua into what the patristic writers termed the ‘spiritual sense’, something that I would call the second-order, symbolic sense when developed in a new context. For example, in a homily on Joshua Origen suggests

[D]oubtless the wars that are waged through Jesus [Joshua], and the slaughter of kings and enemies must also be said to be “a shadow and type of heavenly things,” namely, of those wars that our Lord Jesus with his army and officers—that is, the throngs of believers and their leaders—fights against the Devil and his angels. For it is he himself who strives with Paul and with the Ephesians “against sovereigns and authorities and the rulers of darkness, against spiritual forces of wickedness in heavenly places.” ... The kingdoms of earth are not promised to you by the Gospels, but kingdoms of heaven. These kingdoms, however, are neither deserted nor abandoned; they have their own inhabitants, sinners and vile spirits, fugitive angels. Paul, sounding the apostolic trumpet, exhorts you to the battle against those who dwell there. Just as Jesus said then that your war would be against the Amorites and Perizzites and Hivites and Jebusites, likewise Paul also declares to you here, saying, “Your fight will not be against flesh and blood,” that is, we shall not fight in the same manner as the ancients fought. Nor are the battles in our land to be conducted against humans “but against sovereigns, against authorities, against the rulers of darkness of this world.” Certainly you understand now where you must undertake struggles of this kind.⁷⁹

Thus the early church fathers were sensitive to Joshua’s symbolic and existential nature, showing little concern for the significance of ‘history’ in Joshua whilst indicating ways in which it may be enacted in a new context. But over time this symbolic power was lost as Joshua’s significance was located increasingly in historicizing terms.⁸⁰ The tradition moves from Origen’s spiritual reading, through Calvin’s ‘literal’ reading into the problems that we now encounter through historical and ethical critical concerns.⁸¹ Joshua has become ‘tired’, with its significance assumed to lie in historicizing terms.

Moreover, there has been the particular trend in modern Western thought to privilege ‘history’, and an epistemology associated with it, over attentive, imaginative, or ‘prophetic’ discernment, a privileging which is, interestingly, itself a ‘mythic perception of reality’, as W.T. Stevenson has outlined.⁸² This has been a ‘double whammy’ for texts ⁷⁹ Hom. Josh. 12.1. See also Gregory of Nyssa, ‘The Lord’s Prayer’, Sermon 1, in St. Gregory of Nyssa: The Lord’s Prayer, The Beatitudes (Trans. H.C. Graef) (ACW 18) (New York: Paulist Press, 1954) pp.30-31, for a similar move.

⁸⁰ One may track a trajectory throughout the history of the church as regards biblical interpretation in this way. For example, whilst Origen did not attempt to harmonize the gospels (although Augustine did), by the middle ages complex and ingenious attempts to harmonize were well developed, reflecting a growing concern with ‘history’ (See R.W. Southern, ‘The Sovereign Textbook of the Schools: the Bible’ in Scholastic Humanism and the Unification of Europe (Oxford: Blackwell, 1995) vol. 1, pp.102-133).

⁸¹ Whilst, as we saw above, Calvin offers a typological interpretation of the Promised Land in the Institutes, there is no sign of this kind of interpretation in his commentary on Joshua.

⁸² W.T. Stevenson, ‘History as Myth: Some Implications for History and Theology’, in Cross Currents 20:1 (1970), pp.15-28: ‘My thesis is that what is commonly termed “history” is a mythic perception of reality.’

such as Joshua, for we have become quite unable to 'hear' the text - Canaanites, and their genocide, have been historicized, leading in turn to ethical objections, losing the challenging existential nature of the text.

Victor Turner

'Existential' approaches to myth can be understood and developed in other ways, such as by Victor Turner. For Turner myth is associated with performance, performance that is often understood in terms of ritual. But Turner developed and extended conceptions of 'ritual' and 'performance' to encompass the 'enaction' of social actions in daily life, and so these may be construed broadly. He concludes From Ritual to Theatre:

When we act in everyday life we do not merely re-act to indicative stimuli, we act in frames we have wrested from the genres of cultural performance. And when we act on the stage, whatever our stage may be, we must now in this reflexive age of psychoanalysis and semiotics as never before, bring into the symbolic or fictitious world the urgent problems of our reality. We have to go into the subjunctive world of monsters, demons, and clowns, of cruelty and poetry, in order to make sense of our daily lives, earning our daily bread. And when we enter whatever theatre our lives allow us, we have already learned how strange and many-layered everyday life is, how extraordinary the ordinary. We then no longer need in Auden's terms the "endless safety" of ideologies but prize the "needless risk" of acting and interacting.⁸³

Hence for Turner myths are enacted and 'performed' in daily life, providing a symbolic, existential contours to encourage one to live in certain ways.⁸⁴

In his earlier work Turner suggested that myths 'treat of origins, but derive from transitions ... Myths are liminal phenomena: they are frequently told at a time or in a site that is "betwixt and between".'⁸⁵ Here, he develops the notion of myths as 'liminal phenomena' from Arnold van Gennep's work on rites of passage, but suggests that myths have a liminal character even where they are not bound to rites. Importantly he remarks that myths

When one stands within this myth, all reality is seen as being historical in nature. ... No more damning criticism can be made of anyone than that of having falsified history, i.e. of having tampered with the "true" and the "sacred". ... Consequently, I believe that what is often called "historical consciousness" conforms essentially to what Eliade calls "myth," and hence I believe that we are justified in asserting that history is a mythic way of viewing reality.' (pp.17-19).

⁸³ V. Turner, From Ritual to Theatre: The Human Seriousness of Play (New York: PAJ, 1982), p.122.

⁸⁴ Cf. also his comments in his introduction (ibid, pp.7-19).

⁸⁵ V. Turner, 'Myth and Symbol', in D.L. Sills (ed.), International Encyclopedia of the Social Sciences (Macmillan & The Free Press, 1968), vol.10, pp.576-581, here p.576. Note that here Turner develops a notion of myth that is (I think unnecessarily) rather more narrow than the one that I am developing – I would not limit myths to treatments of origins.

involve a restructuring of social relationships - with the possibility of conflict and disorder. The well-known amorality of myths is intimately connected with their existential bearing. The myth does not describe what ought to be done ... Liminal symbolism, both in its ritual and mythic expressions, abounds in direct or figurative transgressions of the moral codes that hold good in secular life, such as human sacrifice, human flesh eating, and incestuous unions of brother-sister or mother-son deities or their human representatives. Thus the theory that myths are paradigmatic (Eliade 1957) or that myths afford precedents and sanctions for social status and moral rules (Malinowski 1925) requires some sort of qualification. Myths and liminal rites are not to be treated as models for secular behavior. Nor, on the other hand, are they to be regarded as cautionary tales, as negative models which should not be followed. ... Liminality is pure potency, where anything can happen, where immoderacy is normal, even normative, and where the elements of culture and society are released from their customary configurations and recombined in bizarre and terrifying imagery. Yet this boundlessness is restricted - although never without a sense of hazard - by the knowledge that this is a unique situation and by a definition of the situation which states that the rites and myths must be told in a prescribed order and in a symbolic rather than a literal form. The very symbol that expresses at the same time restrains; through mimesis there is an acting out - rather than the acting - of an impulse that is biologically motivated but socially and morally reprehended.⁸⁶

In other words, myths for Turner have symbolic and existential characteristics and are, in some sense, to be 'enacted'; but they are not to be enacted in any straightforward way as models to follow for example. This provides an important qualification, or different perspective, on the idea of 'world of the text', and on the way that mythical texts might invite us to re-imagine our world.

These are crucial observations, for there are clear resonances with what Turner describes as the characteristics of myth and the contents of Joshua, such as the מִן, and the restructuring of social relationships, points that I shall return to later. But in terms of discerning Joshua's significance, coupling Turner's remarks on both the role of myth and its amoral nature with traditional interpretation of the Old Testament, and with our consideration of the 'historicization' of myths and symbols, we see that Joshua's significance is located neither in a 'literal sense' nor 'historical sense', nor indeed in a 'moral sense', but rather in something approaching what the Christian tradition has termed the 'spiritual sense', a sense that might be termed the 'second-order symbolic sense' today. Then, re-appropriating Barth one might say that

The idea that the Bible declares the Word of God only when it speaks ethically or historically is one which must be abandoned, especially in the Christian Church. One consequence of this misunderstanding was the great uncertainty of faith which resulted from an inability wholly to escape the impression that many elements in the Bible have the nature of myth, and an ignorance of where and how to draw the line which ⁸⁶ Ibid, p.577. It is important to emphasize here that this is myth according to Turner's conception of it, and so given the broader perspective that I am developing here, this analysis should be understood to refer to one kind of myth – i.e. there may be other narratives that one might label 'myth' that do not share these characteristics.

marks off what is finally ethical or historical and therefore the true Word of God. But in other cases it led to a rigid affirmation that in the Bible, as the Word of God, we have only “ethical” accounts and no myth at all - an affirmation which can be sustained only if we either close our eyes or violently reinterpret what we see. In other cases again it resulted in an attempt to penetrate to an “ethical” or “historical” kernel which is supposed to give us the true, i.e., “ethical” or “historical” word of God - the only trouble being that in the process it was unfortunately found that with the discarding of myth we do lose not only a subsidiary theme but the main point at issue, i.e., the biblical witness. We have to realise that in all three cases the presumed equation of the Word of God with an “ethical” or “historical” record is an inadmissible postulate which does not itself originate in the Bible at all but in the unfortunate habit of contemporary thought which assumes that the validity and enduring significance of a narrative stands or falls by whether it is “ethical” or “historical”.⁸⁷

Indeed, we may discover ways in which Joshua is to be ‘enacted and performed’ in the Christian context through its juxtaposition with new myths such as Eph. 6 in Origen’s Homilies on Joshua, as we saw above. Thus the Christian interpreter of the Old Testament is not necessarily forced to have to simply ‘shape up’ to and accept narratives that portray an ‘immoral’ God at face value, and provide an apologetic for such material, such as one finds in Calvin’s comments on Josh. 10:18 for example:

Joshua is now free ... to inflict punishment on the kings. In considering this, the divine command must always be kept in view. ... But as such was [God’s] pleasure, it behoves us to acquiesce in his decision, without presuming to inquire why he was so severe.⁸⁸

But neither is one forced to reject such immoral material as the word of God. Rather, in the light of Turner’s observations, the contemporary Christian interpreter is freed to re-appropriate the kind of approach found in Origen or Gregory of Nyssa. Ethical difficulties in a narrative indicate that one should seek its significance somewhere other than in its ‘literal sense’. This is a reflection of the nature of the material that we have.

So Joshua, and its use, resonates with the kind of approach to myth that Victor Turner develops. One should not be surprised that Joshua contains amoral and unethical material, being something that it shares with other ‘myths’. Joshua provides a symbolic existential resource that is to be enacted or performed in some sense, although this is something that will require very careful elucidation.

2.5 Structuralist approaches to myth

An important approach to myth is the structuralist approach of Claude Lévi-Strauss. In an introduction to it he outlines two aspects of this approach that have been foundational to it, and to developments of it. First, he suggests that myths are viewed as having a dynamic significance:

⁸⁷ Cf. CD III/1, p.82, cited above.

⁸⁸ Calvin, Joshua, pp.157-158.

our method eliminates a problem which has been so far one of the main obstacles to the progress of mythological studies, namely the quest for the true version, or the earlier one. On the contrary, we define myth as consisting of all its versions ... a myth remains the same as long as it is felt as such.⁸⁹

Secondly, he notes that 'mythical thought always works from the awareness of oppositions towards their progressive mediation'.⁹⁰ Robert Segal summarizes the importance of this aspect of Lévi-Strauss's approach thus:

Lévi-Strauss ... treats myth as a coldly intellectual phenomenon: the oppositions expressed in myth constitute logical puzzles rather than existential predicaments. Myth involves thinking, not feeling. At the same time myth involves more the process than the content of thinking. Here Lévi-Strauss anticipates the focus of contemporary cognitive psychologists. ...

Lévi-Strauss alone dispenses with the plot, or 'diachronic dimension', of myth and locates the meaning of myth in the structure, or 'synchronic dimension'. Where the plot of a myth is that event A leads to event B, which leads to event C, which leads to event D, the structure, which is identical with the expression and resolution of contradictions, is either that events A and B constitute an opposition mediated by event C, or that events A and B, which constitute the same opposition, are to each other as events C and D, an analogous opposition, are to each other.⁹¹

In practice structuralist readings often highlight questions of construction of identity. And Joshua can be read as being concerned with the construction of identity and the tempering of 'contradictions', such as in the stories of Rahab and Achan, which suggests that a structuralist approach is an appropriate tool for studying Joshua.⁹² Moreover, given that Joshua is interpreted and developed, often homiletically, at some length in the Christian context, for example by Origen, this indicates again the appropriateness of a structuralist analysis, since structuralism is concerned with the development of myths into 'new myths' in new contexts. Indeed, structuralist analysis provides an interesting interpretation of Christian allegorical reading of the Old Testament.⁹³

⁸⁹ C. Lévi-Strauss, 'The Structural Study of Myth' in The Journal of American Folklore vol. 68, No. 270 (Oct.-Dec. 1955), pp.428-444, here p.435. Note the similarities between this comment and the ones above on the development of myth.

⁹⁰ Ibid, p.440.

⁹¹ Segal, Myth, pp.118-119.

⁹² I.e., these characters, and their fates, represent 'contradictions' to the accepted norms of Israelite society. More trivially perhaps, Joshua reflects the juxtaposition of portraits of complete and partial conquest (Josh. 10:28; 11:12-23; 12:7-24; 21:43-45; 23:9-10; 24:11-13 cf. Josh. 9:14-27; 11:22; 15:63; 16:10; 17:11-12; 19:47). Such 'contradiction' draws attention to the mythical nature of the material, and suggests that Joshua uses the tempering of such contradictions to serve its very function.

⁹³ See R.B. Williams, 'Origen's Interpretation of the Old Testament and Lévi-Strauss' Interpretation of Myth', in A.L. Merrill & T.W. Overholt (eds), Scripture in History & Theology: Essays in Honor of J. Coert Rylaarsdam (PTMS 17) (Pittsburgh: The Pickwick Press, 1977), pp.279-299 for a structuralist analysis of Origen's use of the Old Testament.

However, structuralist approaches have been widely criticized, perhaps most notably by Ricoeur, who said of Lévi-Strauss, as far as you are concerned there is no 'message' ... you despair of meaning; but you console yourself with the thought that, if men have nothing to say, at least they say it so well that their discourse is amenable to structuralism. You retain meaning, but it is the meaning of non-meaning, the admirable syntactical arrangement of a discourse which has nothing to say.⁹⁴

In light of this sort of criticism, Seth Kunin has developed the structuralist work of Lévi-Strauss in new directions into what he terms 'neo-structuralism'.⁹⁵ It is his approach that I would like to develop now, being an important development and improvement of classical structuralism that makes it more attractive and amenable to synthesis with other approaches to myth.

Kunin suggests that the basis of structuralist theory is that all cultural objects will have as their foundation an unconscious underlying structure. Cultural objects from the same context will largely share the same underlying structural equation. ... [S]tructure at its deepest level organizes patterns of categories that are abstract and contentless — it is the pattern that is significant rather than the meanings articulated by that pattern. The pattern, however, should also be seen as the basis for creating meaningful cultural objects. Structure provides the underlying logic that allows things to be said and to be understood. It creates the logical possibilities that determine how and what can be meaningfully communicated.⁹⁶

In developing neo-structuralism he introduces distinctions into levels of structure,⁹⁷ distinctions that I shall consider below. But he is less ambitious than Lévi-Strauss and other structuralists who seek to impose a 'particular content or meaning on a biological or universal level', for neo-structuralism is interested in 'culture specific aspects of structure rather than the biological'.⁹⁸ Crucially he notes that 'many readings of structuralism viewed it as denying human agency both in the creation of cultural artefacts and in practice', and thus neo-structuralism seeks to account for such agency:

Agency comes into play in the process of emphasizing or de-emphasizing aspects of structure, particularly in cases of cultural overlap. This process leads to possible transformation in structure, and thus removes the static view of culture that is often associated with structuralism. ... Agency provides one of the motors for structural transformation. Agency, which is largely conscious, does not directly change underlying structure, rather it privileges different aspects of the structural ⁹⁴ Ricoeur, 'Confrontation', p.74. See also P. Ricoeur, 'Biblical Hermeneutics' in Semeia 4 (1975), pp.29-148, here, p. 65.

⁹⁵ Kunin, We Think What We Eat.

⁹⁶ Ibid, p.7.

⁹⁷ Ibid, p.5.

⁹⁸ Ibid, p.6. '[T]he holy grail of classical structuralism was the discovery of the underlying structures of the brain that were shared by all human beings.' (p.7).

equation, and by so doing leads to a slow process by which models of categorization and thinking can change.⁹⁹

He introduces three structural levels and a narrative level for analysis which he denotes S^1 , S^2 , S^3 and N. S^1 is the most basic and abstract level, related to the biological structure of the human brain as capable of structuring; S^2 is the next structural level, which has no informational content, and is 'understood to be unconsciously shaped by a culture', providing the basis for the nature of categorization and the relationships between categories in order to create culturally meaningful patterns;¹⁰⁰ The S^3 level is culture and context specific, containing available mythological elements (mythemes or symbols) that find meaning in relation to other mythemes or symbols in that cultural context. Finally, it is at the N level that these symbols or mythemes are combined into a narrative that is the myth that one analyzes.¹⁰¹ So, for example, in a given culture the S^2 level reflects the existence of abstract categories, say A and B, and the relationships between them; for example where A and B are mutually exclusive categories with mediation or transformation between them being impossible, such as Kunin identifies is the case in Ancient Israel. This structure then finds expression in concrete terms at the S^3 level, for example in the categorization of animals as 'clean' or 'unclean' in Ancient Israel, or in the categorization 'priests' and 'non-priests' for example. The point is that the basic underlying structure at the S^2 level is 'recapitulated' in various ways throughout the culture.¹⁰² These 'concrete' categories, understood as symbols or mythemes, are then woven into material at the N level, forming actual myths.

Kunin introduces a definition of myth [that] works on two levels both of which arise from structuralist theory. The underlying structure of the definition is 'highly structured narrative (or related) material'. This definition ... sees myth as that body of material in which the structures are most strongly articulated. The definition at this level is open-ended; it makes no determination either to content or function. The next level of definition narrows this range to narrative or related material (for example genealogies) that is used by a particular community to structure its understanding of self and the world.¹⁰³

⁹⁹ Ibid, p.6.

¹⁰⁰ Ibid, p.11.

¹⁰¹ Ibid, pp.7-14.

¹⁰² Ibid, pp.25-27.

¹⁰³ Ibid, p.20.

Thus a narrative that can be said to be ‘mythical’ in this sense requires analysis at both structural and narrative levels, and these analyses will inform one another, suggesting that the approaches of Kunin and Ricoeur may inform each other.¹⁰⁴ So whilst for Lévi-Strauss myths are ‘coldly intellectual’, for neo-structuralism, when viewed at the narrative level, space is created for more existential and emotional aspects; symbols may take on a richer sense in this domain. Indeed, I noted earlier that from the perspective of a theological anthropology that it is likely that Christian myths will involve both intellectual and emotive dimensions.

Neostructuralist analysis suggests that transformation of myths, and structure, occurs at several levels. It occurs at the N level, where transformations of the narrative, or developments of it, tend to crystallize and articulate the issues present in the myth if these elements are not culturally problematic, or to cloud the issues if they are culturally problematic. Through such development mythemes can be given different emphases or prominence. Kunin denotes the process of transformation at the S³ level as bricolage, reflecting changes in the elements out of which myths constructed, as the cultural context changes. ‘It is through bricolage that new elements are unconsciously categorized and assembled to create new cultural constructs.’¹⁰⁵ But neither of these processes transform the underlying structure. In an important departure from classical structuralism Kunin introduces the idea of agency. Whilst it relates to processes of transformation at all levels, ¹⁰⁴ Kunin tends to concentrate on structural concerns. Whilst Ricoeur was at odds with classical structuralism, as we have noted, it appears that neo-structuralism, as Kunin sets it up, is more amenable to use alongside Ricoeur’s approach. However, one potential difficulty in using the approaches together relates to the question of symbols, for in many ways Kunin remains close to Lévi-Strauss’ account of symbols as conventional with their meaning determined by their structural role and their placement within a set of structural relations (ibid, pp.13-14, 35), whilst Ricoeur is understood to offer a somewhat more ‘transcendental’ account of symbols. For example, Lévi-Strauss stated that ‘here I am perhaps in disagreement with Paul Ricoeur – symbols, to use a term he is particularly fond of, never have any intrinsic significance. Their meanings can only be ‘positional’ meanings, and it follows that they cannot be available to us in the myths themselves, but only be reference to the ethnographic context, i.e. to what we know about the way of life, the techniques, the ritual and the social organization of the societies whose myths we wish to analyse.’ (‘Confrontation’, p.60). But in response Ricoeur suggested that, ‘I demonstrated the non-existence of the naturally symbolic, that a symbolism only functions within an economy of thought, within a structure; that is why hermeneutics will never be possible without structuralism’ (ibid, p.63). This would suggest that the two approaches to symbol are not in fact incompatible. Indeed, Kunin grants that symbols work simultaneously on several levels and are multivocal (We Think What We Eat, pp.35-36), so, although differently nuanced and developed, these accounts of symbol, are closer than they may seem.

¹⁰⁵ Kunin, We Think What We Eat, p.18.

it is important to highlight the role of agency with regard to the most significant forms of transformation, transformations at the S² level, the underlying structure. It ‘comes into play through the individual’s conscious and unconscious emphasis or privileging of aspects of the underlying structural equation.’ Differing emphases ‘will shape [a group’s] own conscious and unconscious use of the underlying structure, and can, through pushing at the edges of the system, shift it as it transforms through time. This process is facilitated in cultural situations in which different cultural equations come into contact’.¹⁰⁶ Kunin describes the ‘conscious articulation of this form of agency’ as jonglerie, or ‘identity juggling’. It encapsulates the process by which individuals privilege different elements of their cultural repertoire at different points in time depending on context and individual choice. Jonglerie is not a random process, it allows the individual to highlight or select different aspects of their identity and thereby to shape and reshape different levels of their use and experience of structure. The theoretical concept of jonglerie highlights the constant process of conscious and unconscious negotiation of identity and the fact that all identities are in some sense contested.¹⁰⁷

So we see here how concerns relating to ideology come into play, and of how the development of the significance of a narrative relate to those of structure, and vice versa, and how this is played out at conscious and subconscious levels.

Thus for a biblical text that contains ‘structured material’ such as Joshua, viewing it as myth in this perspective will highlight the structural categories that the text reflects and their relations, and in particular, the ways in which ‘tensions’ in categorization are tempered with regard to the construction of identity. When read canonically, such an approach may indicate the presence of a ‘pushing’ of the ideology of the categorization and structural relationships in Joshua. Indeed, Joshua is concerned with the structure of insider:outsider definitions and relationships as demonstrated in the stories of Rahab and Achan for example, stories which, as well as subconsciously reflecting an underlying structure, represent an ideological ‘pushing’ of the structure, for Rahab, the ‘outsider’, appears to gain the status of an ‘insider’, something that arguably the underlying structure does not normally permit, for Israelite identity was essentially genealogically constructed, and does not allow transformation between categories, or their mediation.¹⁰⁸ But it is the narrative level discourse that gives content to how identity is constructed with reference to these categories and their relationships.

¹⁰⁶ Ibid, p.22.

¹⁰⁷ Ibid, p.23.

Moreover, this approach indicates that texts such as Joshua will find their significance developed through juxtaposition with other myths, and will be subject to development at both structural and narrative levels. Indeed, an interesting shift takes place with the juxtaposition of these Old Testament texts with those of the New, for a shift in underlying structure takes place in the New Covenant; at the S² level an important transformation takes place, for in the Christian context mediation between categories, and transformation between categories is now possible and indeed inherent to the underlying structure.¹⁰⁹ Non-Christians can convert to become Christians, demonstrating transformation, whereas non-Israelites could not, on the whole, convert to become Israelites, for Israelite identity was essentially genealogically determined,¹¹⁰ and mediation is possible in the Christian context too, such as in Jesus who shares human and divine natures. Moreover in the Christian context, at the S³ level certain distinctions, such as those between clean and unclean animals lose significance as they are inherently associated with the underlying old structure of thought, and so there is a change at the S³ level. Certain myths and mythemes thus cease to have significance, becoming simply ‘records of the past’ – important records, as cultural memory would indicate, but records that no longer have direct existential significance, such as some Antiochene exegesis of the Old Testament understood. Finally, with changes in cultural context there is development at the N level, and so for example when Old Testament images of actual violence and warfare become problematic in the Christian era there is a tendency to develop or ‘cloud’ these difficulties at the N level by developments of the material into new myths via allegorical and spiritual reading, such as in Origen’s Homilies on Joshua.

¹⁰⁸ Ibid, e.g. pp.168-192, esp. pp.181-184; pp.238-246. See chapters 8 & 9 for development of these ideas, and consideration of the slightly more ambiguous status of Rahab in the narrative than traditional readings have tended to assume.

¹⁰⁹ Ibid, pp.238-246.

¹¹⁰ The exceptions, such as Rahab, Ruth and Naaman are just that, reflecting the pushing of the structure, but are well known stories to Christians precisely because they reflect an attempt to move to a structure that includes conversion. Kunin demonstrates that some of the more difficult texts in Genesis (e.g. Gen. 34) are a more accurate reflection of the underlying Israelite structure.

Hence a neo-structuralist approach draws attention to major transformations of all Old Testament materials, and not just legal materials for example, when they are taken into the church, a point that is often obscured, but one that neo-structuralism highlights. So when an Old Testament text is read in a Christian context important transformation of its significance necessarily takes place at various levels for theological reasons that can be described in structural terms. Difference in the underlying structures is one way of expressing the ‘oldness’ of the Old Testament, and is something that is significant theologically and hermeneutically. But Joshua is almost unique here, for perhaps more than any other Old Testament text it reflects a pushing of the underlying structure towards that of the New Covenant, reflected in the possibility of transformation between categories, i.e. of ‘conversion’. Hence the widespread typological use of Rahab, where her ‘faith’ is transposed into a new key, with Christ now taken as the object of faith, is understandable.¹¹¹ So in this sense, perhaps Joshua more than most other Old Testament narratives is amenable to use in a Christian context. But for this to occur developments must take place at the narrative level to suit the new cultural context, described theologically in terms of the results of the incarnation. The necessary transformation of reading strategy often occurred through allegorical interpretation and spiritual reading – a transformation of mythemes in a new cultural context. Hence Rahab is universally a ‘type’ for the faithful Christian convert, with her house a type of the church.¹¹² Whilst often seen as fanciful and arbitrary,¹¹³ allegorical interpretations of the Old Testament were in fact fairly stable – Rahab is almost universally a type for the Christian convert exercising faith in some way, and so such readings do in fact provide a culturally stable ‘traditional’ resource and ‘new myth’ into which Joshua is assimilated and used. Moreover, whilst allegorical interpretations have been criticized for disregarding the narrative movement, from a structuralist perspective this diachronic narrative movement is insignificant; it is the synchronic relations that count, and so from this perspective it would seem that one can produce a good reading of the text that neglects its narrative flow and plot development.

¹¹¹ See chapters 8 and 9 for development of this.

¹¹² E.g. Heb. 11:31; Jas. 2:25; 1 Clem. 12; Origen, Hom. Josh. 3.5; Cyprian, Letter 69.4; Chrysostom Homilies on Repentance and Almsgiving 7.5.16; Cyril of Jerusalem Catechetical Lectures 2.9 (in ACCS Josh. pp.12-15). Moreover, Rahab is even understood typologically in some Antiochene exegesis, such as in Theodoret of Cyrus (Quest. Josh. 2.2, pp.267-268).

¹¹³ I think that it can be as regards many details.

In summary then, the importance of a neo-structuralist approach for reading Joshua is clear, for it has great potential to illuminate a number of aspects of the text and its subsequent reception, use and development.

2.6 Reading Joshua with mythical perspectives

A text that is mythical in the sort of ways identified above finds its meaning and significance expressed and developed in a number of different ways. Sensitivity to the mythical character of a text indicates that its significance is not only or necessarily located in its 'literal', 'historical' or 'first-order' sense; rather its significance lies 'beyond' this, which is something that traditional spiritual reading of the Old Testament has sought to capture, even if inadequately. Thus as 'myth' an Old Testament narrative may be understood as a particular cultural expression that testifies in an existentially engaging fashion to an imaginative world that seeks to shape the way in which the community and the individual lives, thinks and feels, centring in particular on response to God. The significance of such a narrative is located in terms of this shaping of identity, shaping that may or may not relate straightforwardly to the 'literal sense' of the narrative, and may or may not endure beyond a rather limited context of use, even if its 'historical effects' endure from the perspective of cultural memory. Where its significance does endure it is likely to need careful re-expression.

Reading Joshua in this way, the focus is taken off construing Joshua's significance in terms of a bloody genocide and xenophobia. Rather, it is a narrative set in a foundational, prototypical time that grants the narrative legitimacy, a narrative that expresses a desire for rest. 'Typological' readings that develop the story eschatologically can be seen as developing what is already there, and not as readings that impose an alien and unjustifiable reading on the text. A neo-structuralist approach indicates that Joshua may be understood as tackling difficult and searching questions of identity, relations to others, and to the land in ways that are ideologically disturbing for some construals of Israelite identity: the story of Rahab challenges the perception of the ‘otherness’ of the outsider; the story of Achan challenges the comfortable insider, and the story of the altar building (Josh. 22) challenges the status of the land.¹¹⁴

Finally, to draw together the work of Ricoeur, Turner and Kunin, I would like to explore one specific and important way in which the meaning of myths is located ‘below the surface’. Myths sometimes narrate immoral behaviour. Whilst the neo-structuralist and existential approaches to myth develop the significance of symbols in rather different ways, I would like to draw attention now to some similarities in the way in which according to both accounts symbols may of necessity be morally problematic through a property that I will term a ‘limit-situation’. Doty remarks that

Myths belong to poetic attempts to express this there-ness [of the world and being] in all its aspects, whether subsequently named sacred or profane, beneficent or maleficent. They express limit-situations, boundaries, not through explanation but as enarrations, storied presentations of powerful experiences transcending the expressivity of ordinary language.¹¹⁵

‘Limit-situation’ is a helpful way of expressing the nature of some of the material that we find in myth.¹¹⁶ The idea functions in several related yet distinct ways. First, in the most straightforward way, it acts as an exemplar. In Gen. 22 Abraham’s obedience in being prepared to sacrifice Isaac demonstrates ‘in the limit’ what obedience looks like. It provides an existential ‘paradigm’ that is to be enacted in less extreme ways in ordinary life. The story demonstrates in an existentially demanding fashion what obedience to God entails in its most demanding form. Secondly, again with reference to Abraham, Kunin has indicated the logic behind Abraham’s incestuous relationship with Sarah. Here, the ‘limit-situation’ is genealogical closeness. From a structuralist perspective an incestuous relationship is logically required in the case of the Patriarchs in order to preserve genealogical identity, even though this relationship is prohibited in the levitical legislation on incest. Thus structural and narrative needs are in opposition, and here structural rather than narrative concerns dominate;¹¹⁷ it is a ‘limit-situation’ necessitated by Abraham, and his wife, being ‘the limit’ of Israel as its origin. In this sense, this

¹¹⁴ See chapters 8 & 9.

¹¹⁵ Doty, Mythography, p.103.

¹¹⁶ ‘Limit-situation’ is discussed from a slightly different angle in Paul Ricoeur’s essay ‘Biblical Hermeneutics’.

¹¹⁷ Cf. Kunin, We Think what we Eat, p.119.

‘limit-situation’ is not something to aspire to in the same way as Abraham’s obedience, but it engenders the need to marry within the community of Israel to preserve identity. But in both cases the expression of a ‘limit-situation’ necessitates the portrayal of immoral behaviour, behaviour that is not to be emulated but enacted at another existential level. Limit-situations exist to manifest particular issues of importance. I will argue in chapters 6, 8 and 9 that חרם reflects a limit-situation too, although perhaps in a slightly different way again in Joshua.

In summary, reading Joshua ‘as myth’ illuminates its real significance, and draws attention to ways in which its significance endures through its reception and use. However, whilst this sort of approach indicates how one might account for Joshua and the hermeneutics of its reception and use, it does not reveal how, and whether, it ought to be received and used, and thus how one assesses the sense in which it might be ‘normative’, ‘revelatory’ or ‘true’. I shall now turn to these concerns.

Chapter 3

The hermeneutics of reading Joshua as Christian Scripture

In chapter 2 I considered how we may ‘learn about our learning’ in essentially ‘phenomenological’ terms through a descriptive account of how, in general, communities learn and shape their identity and existence through ‘myth’ and I also provided some initial reflections upon the significance of this for how Joshua might shape Christian identity. It is an account of how symbols and stories do function and develop and neither an account of how they ought to function and develop, nor of whether they are in any sense normative or ‘true’. But the Christian interpreter will wish to ascertain whether the Old Testament narratives can be said to be ‘true’. Moreover, whilst in different ways Paul Ricoeur, Victor Turner and Seth Kunin’s analyses provide descriptive accounts of the development of Joshua in Origen’s Homilies, for example, can such interpretation be said to be ‘true’? And what then ought the interpreter of Joshua to seek to interpret – the text itself or the text together with the tradition of its reception and development into new myths?

Whilst it is tempting to frame the question in this way, relating to truth, this predicate may be unhelpful or misleading, as we saw in Ricoeur’s analysis of history and fiction in ‘The Narrative Function’, owing to the difficulty of knowing where to locate a text’s referentiality, and thus the difficulty of defining ‘truth’. Moreover, it is difficult to see how a development of a myth in, say, neo-structuralist perspective, if construed as an ‘interpretation’, can be said to be ‘true’ or not qua interpretation. Rather, I wish to suggest that it will be more profitable for the Christian interpreter of the Old Testament to ask whether a text such as Joshua can be said to offer a faithful and fitting redescription of the world that invites the reader, and the community that values the text, into new ways of understanding and relating to God and the world, and of new ways of being in the world, that leads to fuller and more faithful participation in their humanity as created in the image of God and perfected in Christ.¹ I would then wish to speak of the text as being revelatory if it can be understood thus in a particular context.²

However, a text – here, Joshua, a myth as a story, can be appropriated in different ways by different readers, or at least by different ‘interpretative communities’, giving rise to ‘new’ myths, as we saw from a neo-structuralist perspective. Does one therefore need to speak of both a text and a particular tradition of reception together as being ‘faithful and fitting’, and hence ‘revelatory’ (or not), and not just a text? As we saw in chapter 1, Irenaeus argued that one does need to interpret a scriptural text as embedded within the Christian tradition, and not in isolation from it if it is to be interpreted as Christian Scripture, just as recent accounts of postmodern hermeneutical theory would suggest more generally regarding the role of reading communities. But there are two issues here; the fittingness of the history of reception of a text with respect to the text, and the fittingness of text together with interpretation with respect to the bigger questions of appropriate human response to God. I would now like to turn again to Paul Ricoeur to consider these issues.

3.1 The hermeneutics of texts

Ricoeur suggests that ‘literary texts involve potential horizons of meaning, which may be actualized in different ways’,³ but also that not all interpretations are equal, with there being means of arbitrating between interpretations.⁴ Mark Wallace helpfully interprets Ricoeur here through Beardsley’s guidelines of plenitude and fittingness; interpretations should be ‘fitting’ even though a text gives rise to many possible interpretations.⁵ Thus in terms of plenitude, if a literary text portrays a world – the world of the text – then this

¹ I take this as a basic assumption for this discussion for reading Joshua as Christian Scripture, even if it is not entirely unproblematic.

² I.e. I wish to allow for the possibility that certain Old Testament texts were ‘revelatory’ in their original context in a way that they are not for Christians today, whilst upholding their value as Scripture through the concept of cultural memory.

³ P. Ricoeur, Interpretation Theory: Discourse and the Surplus of Meaning (Fort Worth: The Texan Christian UP, 1976), p.78.

⁴ Ibid., p.79.

⁵ M.I. Wallace, The Second Naiveté: Barth, Ricoeur, and the New Yale Theology (Studies in American Biblical Hermeneutics 6) (Georgia: Mercer UP, 1990), p.65. Cf. also S.M. Schneiders, The Revelatory Text (Collegeville: The Liturgical Press, 2nd ed. 1999), p.xxx, who uses the category of ‘ideal’ meaning instead of the categories of plenitude and fittingness, being based on Ricoeur’s work.

world is amenable to various interpretations and ‘actualizations’, perhaps just as our experienced world is. Different ‘traditions of reception’ may then accentuate and develop different aspects of the world portrayed by a text, whilst allowing other different aspects to recede, in rather different ways. So, in the case of Joshua there is a tradition of reception that develops ‘spiritual’ concerns, another that develops historical concerns, and others that develops colonial/postcolonial concerns. Without a wider frame of reference than the text of Joshua all these construals might be possible fitting construals of the text. Thus ‘plenitude’ refers to the possibility of there being a variety of possible interpretations of the text owing to its inherent surplus of meaning. But then the tradition, and juxtaposition of other texts with Joshua in the canon of Scripture provides constraints that restricts (or highlights) the interpretations that one might wish to call constraints of ‘fittingness’ that guides the use of the text in a particular context. The question is then that of what a good context of use is.

In his work on discourse Ricoeur suggests that ‘the object of hermeneutics is not the “text” but the text as discourse or discourse as the text’⁶ where, ‘Discourse consists of the fact that someone says something to someone about something. “About something” is the inalienable referential function of discourse. Writing does not abolish it, but rather transforms it.’⁷ Elsewhere he develops the idea of a revelatory function of what he terms *poetic discourse*⁸ through the concepts of writing; ‘[writing] produces a form of discourse that is immediately autonomous with regard to the author’s intention. ... [I]n this autonomy, is already contained ... the issue of the text which is removed from the finite intentional horizon of the author’;⁹ and of ‘work’:

By [work] I mean the shaping of discourse through the operation of literary genres such as narration, fiction, the essay, etc. By producing discourse as such and such a work taking up such and such a genre, the composition codes assign to works of discourse that unique configuration we call a style.

⁶ P. Ricoeur, ‘Biblical Hermeneutics’, in Semeia 4 (1975), pp.29-148, here p.67.

⁷ P. Ricoeur, ‘Naming God’, in Figuring the Sacred (Minneapolis: Fortress Press, 1995), pp.217-235, here p.220.

⁸ For Ricoeur, ‘poetics’ does not designate a literary genre, ‘but rather the totality of these genres inasmuch as they exercise a referential function that differs from the descriptive referential function of ordinary language and above all of scientific discourse.’ (P. Ricoeur, ‘Toward a Hermeneutic of the Idea of Revelation’, in P. Ricoeur (ed. L.S. Mudge), Essays on Biblical Interpretation (London: SPCK, 1981), pp.73-118, here, p.100).

⁹ Ibid, p.99.

This shaping of the work concurs with the phenomenon of writing in externalizing and objectifying the text into what one literary critic has called a “verbal icon”;¹⁰ and of ‘world of the text’:

By this I mean that what is finally to be understood in a text is not the author or his presumed intention, nor is it the immanent structure or structures of the text, but rather the sort of world intended beyond the text as its reference. In this regard, the alternative “either the intention or the structure” is vain. For the reference of the text is what I call the issue of the text or the world of the text. The world of the text designates the reference of the work of discourse, not what is said, but about what it is said. Hence the issue of the text is the object of hermeneutics. And the issue of the text is the world the text unfolds before itself.¹¹

Moreover, elsewhere he remarks on the phenomenon of ‘traditionality’ that

[a] trait that a narrative theology may retain ... concerns the role of tradition not only in the transmission but also in the reception and the interpretation of received stories. This phenomenon of traditionality is very complex because it relies on the flexible dialectics between innovation and sedimentation. It is sedimentation that we ascribe to paradigms that help a typology of emplotment to emerge and to get stabilized. But the opposite phenomenon of innovation is no less prominent. Why? Because paradigms generated by a previous innovation provide guidelines for further experimentation in the narrative field. In this dialectic between innovation and sedimentation a whole range of solutions is deployed between the two poles of servile repetition and calculated deviance, passively through all the degrees of déformation réglée.¹²

This is another perspective for considering the development of the use of texts such as Joshua from that of neo-structuralism. But crucially, we may take the embedding of a text such as Joshua within the canon of Scripture as a vital stage in this process of reception, affecting its ongoing significance. Such a text is now part of a new act of discourse, although one that has community assent, that transforms the way in which Joshua might be construed. Ricoeur suggests that, this interweaving brings into play a reading of the biblical writings laid out as one vast “intertext.” This reading must of course take into account the historical-critical method, but it cannot be reduced to it. Where the historical-critical method focuses on the differences between the diverse literary layers brought together in the final redaction, in order to re-establish the Sitz-im-Leben of this or that narrative or this or that institution, the reading I am proposing begins from the fact that the meaning of the recounted events and the proclaimed institutions has become detached from its original Sitz-im-Leben by becoming part of Scripture, and this Scripture has so to speak substituted what we may call a Sitz-im-Wort for the original Sitz-im-Leben. My reading shall begin from here, from the Sitz-im-Wort of events, actions, and institutions that have lost their initial roots and that, as a consequence, now have a textual existence. It is this textual status of the narratives, laws, prophecies, wisdom sayings, and hymns that makes these texts contemporary with one another in the act of reading. This synchronic reading is called for to complete the diachronic approach of the historical-critical method. This synchronic reading is at the same time an intertextual reading, in the sense that, once they are apprehended as a whole, these texts of different origins and intentions work on one another, deplacing their respective intentions and points, and they mutually borrow their dynamism from one another. So read, the Bible becomes a great living intertext, which is the place, the space for a labor of the text on itself. My reading, in short, seeks to grasp this labor of the text upon itself through an act of reconstructive imagination.¹³

¹⁰ Ibid, pp.99-100.

¹¹ Ibid, p.100.

¹² P. Ricoeur, ‘Toward a Narrative Theology: Its Necessity, Its Resources, Its Difficulties’, in Figuring the Sacred, pp.236-248, here, p.240.

I would like to draw several implications from Ricoeur's work. First, the 'fittingness' of an interpretation of a text is not straightforwardly related to the author's intention, to the text as artefact, or to the tradition that the text is embedded in; rather, it sits in tension with all three. On the one hand, the tradition cannot impose any reading on the text, for the text 'as work' needs to be respected; it is 'about something'. However, on the other hand, the text in some sense 'belongs to' the tradition that values and uses it. So certain post-colonial readings of Joshua, for example those that read it from a Canaanite perspective with Rahab becoming identified as a 'traitor' or 'collaborator with imperialism' rather than as a model of faith,¹⁴ may not provide genuinely Christian interpretations of the text precisely because they read from an antagonistic perspective that is not fitting for the use of text, both with respect to the text as an act of discourse and its use in the tradition;¹⁵ Joshua is concerned with shaping 'insiders' and is not concerned with providing an 'outsider' perspective, a perspective that will naturally look rather different. However, this is not to say that all fitting readings must be traditional, for as Ricoeur noted, traditionality is complex, involving sedimentation and innovation. Thus interpretation is a matter of dialectics; the tradition in dialectic with itself and the contemporary context (i.e., contemporary 'innovation' in dialogue with the 'sedimentation' of the existing deposits within the tradition that are in some sense authoritative), and the tradition of reception in dialectic with the original act of discourse.

Secondly, since the interpreter is concerned with the kind of world 'intended beyond the text', which is not quite the 'author's intention' or 'the text itself', this world needs to be 'accessed' through 'critical' tools that relate to genre, literary techniques of composition, lexicography, etc., But this does not necessarily imply that understanding the precise historical circumstances that led to the production of the text is required. Rather, what is required is sufficient knowledge of the historical context of a text so as to make it intelligible; but this might be rather little. The difficulty is ascertaining what counts as sufficient knowledge. It is probably impossible to generalize, and care is required here in not seeking to claim that too much is required, not least since it is so difficult to establish with any confidence the historical context of Joshua's composition. Scholars continue to debate Josianic, exilic and other contexts for 'the most significant' stage of Joshua's composition. But even when the context is 'known',¹⁶ one can only speculate on the intention that lies behind the work; those who assume a Josianic context for Joshua tend to read Joshua as reflecting royal propaganda, sometimes pejoratively,¹⁷ whilst those who assume an exilic context read Joshua in terms of the hopes for return from exile of a beleaguered community.¹⁸ But what is the significance of the identification of such a context for understanding Joshua's theological significance? It is not clear that as much follows as Coote or Creach, for example, would like, for we still do not know what the act of discourse of Joshua sought to achieve, other than through the text itself; if Joshua did arise in a Josianic context then it might not have been used coercively originally. Moreover, the study of myth indicates that questions of 'persistence' are at least as important as those of origin, and, as we shall see below, it is through the persistence of particular ways of construing a text that its 'revelatory significance' is testified to. But an Old Testament text such as Joshua is part of a tradition, or of traditions, and an awareness of such, their language and concerns, is likely to assist in making the text intelligible as a public act of discourse.¹⁹

¹³ P. Ricoeur, 'Biblical Time', in Figuring The Sacred, pp.167-180, p.171.

¹⁴ See D. Mbuwayesango, 'Joshua' in D. Patte (ed), Global Bible Commentary (Nashville: Abingdon Press, 2004), pp.64-73, here p.66 & M.W. Dube, 'Rahab says Hello to Judith: A Decolonizing Feminist Reading', in R.S. Sugirtharajah (ed.), The Postcolonial Biblical Reader (Oxford: Blackwell, 2006), pp.142-158, here p.156.

¹⁵ Of course any interpreter may be free to read any text from whatever perspective they desire; the question is what is claimed for the interpretation.

¹⁶ R.D. Nelson ('Josiah in the Book of Joshua', in JBL 100/4 (1981), pp.531-540) develops a case for a Josianic context. But the matter is not straightforward. For example it is difficult to know which direction dependency might run (i.e., whether the account of Josiah is based upon a story of Joshua, or whether Joshua is 'invented' by Josiah or for his own benefit), if indeed there is any dependency. Moreover, if Josiah's account does reflect a rather tendentious narrative of the Deuteronomist, perhaps rather little may be said as regards historical reconstruction and in particular the relationships between vaguely similar texts, as both accounts might be later inventions to suit a later context.

¹⁷ E.g. R.B. Coote, 'The Book of Joshua', in The New Interpreter's Bible (Nashville: Abingdon, 1998), vol.2, pp.555-719, e.g. pp.584-585, who takes it as supplying justification to the House of David's claim to land.

¹⁸ E.g. J.F.D. Creach, Joshua (Interpretation) (Louisville: John Knox Press, 2003), p.30; W.A. Brueggemann, Theology of The Old Testament: Testimony, Dispute, Advocacy (Minneapolis: Fortress Press, 1997), pp.209-211.

¹⁹ See chapter 4.

But thirdly, if one traces the development of the tradition of which Joshua was already a part then the notion that Joshua reflects an act of ‘discourse’ becomes rather complex. Let us suppose that Joshua was composed from a number of disparate sources. These sources are themselves already acts of discourse which the author(s) of Joshua edited into a new act of discourse, to create a particular ‘world of the text’. But then the placement of Joshua into the canon of Scripture is another act of discourse, yielding another ‘world of the text’ through juxtapositions of texts to create meanings that, however, might or might not have been intentional.²⁰ Indeed, the concept of canon does not rely upon intentionality, rather it relies upon the juxtaposition of a collection of texts that the community has discerned to be of particular importance and significance that are generative of its identity.²¹ The canonical context thus provides a ‘filter’ that is of particular hermeneutical significance for considering how the plenitude and fittingness of Joshua’s interpretation might play out. This ‘world of the text’, its interpretation and appropriation is then developed in the subsequent tradition of its reception which occurs in the dialogue between the contemporary context of the interpreter and of the tradition before it, and the canon in particular. So this criterion of ‘fittingness’ is complex, and one might regard the whole process of the composition and reception of Joshua as (at least potentially) ‘revelatory’, even if there are spurious and wrong twists and turns within the process as well as healthy developments, again implying the need for a dialectical aspect to interpretation. But it is important to note that a story that is used in another story can have its meaning transformed by the process; a minor redactional gloss can transform the meaning of a text, either clarifying or obscuring the ‘world of the text’.²² In summary then, interpretation and revelation is caught up in this whole process of tradition and discourse, and not primarily a punctilinear moment within it,²³ even if there are such punctilinear moments that do have a special revelatory character that is ²⁰ Moreover, this process might reflect several acts of discourse given the gradual emergence of the canon through intermediate stages.

²¹ Cf. J.W. Rogerson, ‘Towards a Communicative Theology of the Old Testament’, in J.G. McConville & K. Möller (eds.), Reading the Law: Studies in Honour of Gordon J. Wenham (London: T&T Clark, 2007), pp.283-296, who is cautious of notions of ‘intentionality’ in relation to the canon. Here he develops notions of canon in terms of cultural memory.

²² I shall discuss Josh. 6:19 & 24 from this perspective in chapter 8.

²³ As, it seems, was the basic assumption of much modernist biblical interpretation.

foundational,²⁴ such as the crucifixion and resurrection.²⁵ Theologically speaking, the ‘revelatory’ character of Joshua might be said to be manifested in the processes of sedimentation and innovation in its reception and use in the tradition. So the notion of plenitude expresses the possibility that the tradition can ‘open up’ possibilities for interpretation of the text that are genuine developments that may be termed ‘revelatory’ in themselves, such as reading Joshua in terms of the spiritual life, whilst the notion of fittingness restricts possibilities for interpretation, e.g. by suggesting that the ‘colonial’ use of Joshua is a poor way of construing the text, because it does not sit well with canonical texts that stress the love of neighbour and God’s desire for the salvation of all, for example. The criterion of ‘fittingness’ thus forms the basis for arbitrating between differing interpretations, even though a plurality of ‘good’ interpretations may exist.²⁶

However, whilst this starts to tackle the question of what ‘faithful and fitting’ means from the perspective of the Christian tradition, it says rather little about whether Joshua and the tradition that it is embedded in are ‘faithful and fitting’ in the sense that I introduced earlier, where I sought to associate this description with the idea of ‘revelation’ and good re-description of the world that leads humanity to its proper telos. But as Kevin Vanhoozer asks with reference to Ricoeur’s work, ‘What is the difference between an imaginative way of being-in-the-world that is a genuine individual or social possibility and a utopian dream derived from the pathology of hope?’²⁷ Vanhoozer wishes to appeal to aspects of historical veracity to provide an epistemological warrant, as is common in modernity, but this will not do, owing to the nature of much ‘revelatory’ material as

²⁴ See 3.2 below.

²⁵ I.e., some texts will have the fittingness of their interpretation constrained by historical concerns – ‘what happened’ if you like, but even here such events are subject to interpretation and development within a tradition – they are not ‘naked facts’; cf. W. Pannenberg, ‘Dogmatic Theses on the Concept of Revelation’, in W. Pannenberg (ed), Revelation as History (London: Sheed & Ward, 1969) pp.123-158, esp. pp.137, 152-153.

²⁶ As noted earlier, Schneiders helpfully introduces the notion of ‘ideal’ meaning (even if the term is a little awkward) in the sense that good readings will share a certain ‘family resemblance’.

²⁷ K. Vanhoozer, Biblical Narrative in the Philosophy of Paul Ricoeur (Cambridge: CUP, 1990), p.240. He suggests, ‘Lacking in Ricoeur’s otherwise brilliant philosophical rehabilitation of metaphor is any indication of how one may judge the difference between good and bad metaphors. ... The question is simply this: if metaphors are our only access to a redescription of the real, how can we know whether or not to believe the metaphor? If what the metaphor affirms cannot be checked by non-metaphorical means, how can we tell the difference between a helpful and a misleading metaphor?’ (p.66).

‘poetic discourse’.²⁸ Appealing to history in this way reflects a mythical perception of reality rampant in modernity,²⁹ but it is an epistemology that is simply not available. How might one proceed? Perhaps it is better to speak of manifestation rather than verification.

3.2 The significance of testimony

Developing Ricoeur’s work, Rowan Williams asks,

How ... do we speak of revelation? The point of introducing the notion at all seems to be to give some ground for the sense in our religious and theological language that the initiative does not ultimately lie with us; before we speak, we are addressed or called. Paul Ricoeur, in an important essay on the hermeneutics of the idea of revelation, has attempted to link the concept with a project for a ‘poetics’, which will spell out the way in which a poetic text, by offering a frame of linguistic reference other than the normal descriptive/referential function of language, ‘restores to us that participation-in or belonging-to an order of things which precedes our capacity to oppose ourselves to things taken as objects opposed to a subject’. The truth with which the poetic text is concerned is not verification, but manifestation. That is to say that the text displays or even embodies the reality with which it is concerned simply by witness or ‘testimony’. ... It displays a ‘possible world’, a reality in which my human reality can also find itself: and in inviting me into its world, the text breaks open and extends my own possibilities. All this, Ricoeur suggests, points to poetry [sc. poetic discourse] as exercising a revelatory function — or, to rephrase this in the terms proposed at the beginning of this paragraph, it manifests an initiative that is not ours in inviting us to a world we did not make. ...

Revelation, on such an account, is essentially to do with what is generative in our experience events or transactions in our language that break existing frames of reference and initiate new possibilities of life. ... And to recognize a text, a tradition or an event as revelatory is to witness to its generative power. It is to speak from the standpoint of a new form of life and understanding whose roots can be traced to the initiating phenomenon. ...

Thus ‘revelation’ is a concept which emerges from a questioning attention to our present life in the light of a particular past — a past seen as ‘generative’. In terms of the scriptural history of Israel, the events of the Exodus were revelatory insofar as they were generative of the community of Israel itself and Torah was revelatory because it was what specified the form of life of that community.³⁰

I would like to develop this notion of testimony.³¹ Regarding testimony Ricoeur suggests that

To be a witness is to have participated in what one has seen and to be able to testify to it.

On the other hand, testimony may break away from the things seen to such a degree that it is concentrated on the quality of an act, a work, or a life, which is in itself a sign of the absolute. In this second sense, which is complementary to the first sense, to be a witness is no longer to testify that . . . , but to testify to. . . This latter expression allows us to understand that a witness may so implicate himself in his testimony that it becomes the best proof of his conviction.³²

²⁸ See P. Ricoeur, ‘The Narrative Function’, in Semeia 13 (1978), pp.177-202. Here, I use the term ‘revelatory’ in a somewhat broader sense than it has often been construed in the Christian tradition, although perhaps Ricoeur allows it to slip a little too far.

²⁹ See W.T. Stevenson, ‘History as Myth: Some Implications for History and Theology’ in Cross Currents 20:1 (1970), pp.15-28.

³⁰ R. Williams, ‘Trinity and Revelation’, in On Christian Theology (Oxford: Blackwell, 2000), pp.131-147, here pp.133-134.

³¹ A notion also developed by Walter Brueggemann in his Theology of The Old Testament.

³² Ricoeur, ‘Toward a Hermeneutic’, p.113.

and elsewhere that

Testimony should be a philosophical problem and not limited to legal or historical contexts where it refers to the account of a witness who reports what he has seen. The term testimony should be applied to words, works, actions, and to lives which attest to an intention, an inspiration, an idea at the heart of experience and history which nonetheless transcend experience and history. The philosophical problem of testimony is the problem of the testimony of the absolute or, better, of absolute testimony of the absolute.³³

He goes on to relate this idea to symbol in a way reminiscent of the discussion above on ‘fittingness’:

The symbol is not obliterated ... its double meaning, its opacity, renders it inexhaustible and causes it never to cease giving rise to thought. But it lacks—or can lack—historic density; its meaning matters more than its historicity. As such it constitutes instead a category of the productive imagination. Absolute testimony, on the contrary, in concrete singularity gives a caution to the truth without which its authority remains in suspense. Testimony, each time singular, confers the sanction of reality on ideas, ideals, and modes of being that the symbol depicts and discovers for us only as our most personal possibilities.³⁴ and to Scripture:

A theology of testimony which is not just another name for the theology of the confession of faith is only possible if a certain narrative kernel is preserved in strict union with the confession of faith. The case par excellence is the faith of Israel which, at first, confessed Yahweh by relating the facts of deliverance which punctuate the history of its liberation. Every “theology of the traditions,” following von Rad, is built on this basic postulation that the Credo of Israel is a narrative confession on the model of the nuclear Credo of Deuteronomy 26:5-9. Where a “history” of liberation can be related, a prophetic “meaning” can be not only confessed but attested. It is not possible to testify for a meaning without testifying that something has happened which signifies this meaning. The conjunction of the prophetic moment, “I am the Lord,” and the historical moment, “It is I, the Lord your God, who has led you out of the land of Egypt and out of the house of bondage” (Exodus 20:2)—is as fundamental as the conjunction of the prophetic moment and the juridical moment. A tension is thus created between confession of faith and narration of things seen, at the heart of which is renewed the ever present tension between the judgment of the judge, who decides without having seen, and the narration of the witness who has seen. There is therefore no witness of the absolute who is not a witness of historic signs, no confessor of absolute meaning who is not a narrator of the acts of deliverance.³⁵

But here we encounter a difficulty, perhaps one that Williams repeats,³⁶ with regard to the nature of the Old Testament materials. Whilst they are certainly generative, perhaps they do not ‘testify’ in quite the sense that Ricoeur envisages, being of a more ‘poetic’ nature (to use his term) than he grants; Gerhard von Rad’s Credo has not been well received in Old Testament scholarship, and a good number of scholars, partly on the basis of the current state of archaeological research, suggest or assume that there was never an

³³ P. Ricoeur, ‘The Hermeneutics of Testimony’, in Essays on Biblical Interpretation, pp.119-154, here pp.119-120.

³⁴ Ibid, pp.121-122.

³⁵ Ibid, pp.133-134.

³⁶ This is not quite clear, for he goes on to cite N.K Gottwald, The Tribes of Yahweh: A Sociology of the Religion of Liberated Israel, 1250-1050 BCE (The Biblical Seminar 66) (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1999).

Israelite exodus from Egypt, something which might find support from a ‘mythical’ reading of the book of Exodus.³⁷ Now, Exodus, for example, is generative of the identity of a community in the way that Williams suggests, and it is testified to in this fashion. But, in all likelihood, it does not provide the kind of testimony that Ricoeur wishes. It is, however, a symbolic story testifying to the experience of Israel, and so even if there was not a ‘historical exodus’ from Egypt, the story may still be understood to testify to an actual ‘exodus experience’ for Israel in the more ‘historical’ form that Ricoeur seeks, told in symbolic form, but having a ‘historical’ basis nonetheless. Exodus would then represent a symbolic way of telling of such foundational, generative experience using available cultural resources to interpret an ‘exodus experience’ that invites existential participation – i.e. to continue to experience ‘exodus’.³⁸ But in fact we find the resource in Ricoeur’s essay itself to overcome the difficulty in his proposal, for he suggests that, ‘Applying this relation to testimony and to the relation of confession to narration points up that the manifestation of the absolute in persons and acts is indefinitely mediated by means of available meanings borrowed from previous scripture.’³⁹ In other words, Exodus may not represent a straightforward testimony to actual historical events as narrated, but it is testimony to a manifestation of God to Israel.

Returning to Joshua, one may suggest that Joshua represents the manifestation of the divine summons in some sense, but in a sense yet to be clarified. It is testimony to a manifestation of the divine in some way, but not in a straightforward sense that construes it as testimony to historical events as narrated.⁴⁰ The sense in which it is testimony is ³⁷ I.e., a number of the major motifs in Exodus reflect ANE mythology set in a ‘history like’ narrative (see e.g. J.D. Levenson, Creation and the Persistence of Evil (Princeton: Princeton UP, 1988), pp.75-76). The textual evidence need not suggest, however, that there was not an exodus from Egypt, and the archaeological evidence remains open to revision.

³⁸ In relation to this question, and that of the conquest, Neil Soggie develops the notion of an ‘inspiration event’ that lies behind the narrative – whilst the narrative is not ‘history’ in the modern sense, a ‘historical event’ lies behind it that inspires it. (N.A Soggie (Myth, God, and War: The Mythopoetic Inspiration of Joshua (Lanham: University Press of America, 2007), e.g. pp.7, 17, 29-30, 110-111).

³⁹ Ricoeur, ‘Hermeneutics of Testimony’, p.145.

⁴⁰ Examples of indicators within text itself that it is not a ‘historical record’ are the nature of the ‘spy’ mission (Josh. 2), the location of Rahab’s house (which needs to be in the city wall to suit the dynamics of Josh. 2, a location that is problematic for Josh. 6 – something that the narrative passes over in silence, but a problem that has been discussed in Jewish exegesis (see R. Drucker, The Book of Joshua: A New Translation with a Commentary anthologized from Talmudic, Midrashic and Rabbinic Sources (New York: Mesorah Publications, 1982), pp.178-179), and the tension between narratives of complete and partial interpreted, clarified, developed, refined and, perhaps, corrected through further manifestation of the divine and testimony to the divine in the tradition,⁴¹ a process that is revelatory and generative of a community transformed into ways of being and action that reflect God's telos for humanity.

Thus one may say that Joshua is revelatory today if it is generative of contemporary Christian life and experience by providing a faithful and fitting witness to God by developing the existential significance of foundational 'inspiration events' into the present. The interpreter's task is to consider whether, and if so how, it is, which is something of a dialectical process as outlined above concerned with exploring the plenitude – or surplus of meaning, and fittingness of the text with respect to its tradition of reception when viewed from the interpreter's contemporary context. Whilst one might like to 'stand outside' the tradition to seek to discern an objective view of its truth, in doing so one cuts oneself off from the very manifestations which makes such discernment possible. But one must thus recognize the provisionality of the tradition itself that is oriented towards an eschatological telos. In Brueggemann's terms the tradition, including the biblical tradition perhaps, contains both 'testimony' and 'counter-testimony' to the manifestation of the divine.⁴² In other words, testimony and discernment are intimately related.

But what does the task involve in more practical terms? Returning to the questions raised at the end of chapter 2, is the task for the contemporary Christian interpreter of Joshua conquest (Josh. 10:28; 11:12-23; 12:7-24; 21:43-45; 23:9-10; 24:11-13 cf. Josh. 9:14-27; 11:22; 15:63; 16:10; 17:11-12; 19:47). Moreover, in canonical perspective there is tension between the ways in which it was envisaged that Israel possessed the land - in Ex. 23:20-33 it is envisaged that the locals will simply vanish (כחך, 23:23), whereas they are to be destroyed (חרם) according to Deut. 7:1-5, whilst Lev. 18:25 envisages the land 'vomiting out' (אֵרֶץ) the locals. Whilst it is possible to harmonize the accounts of Rahab's house – for example by suggesting that most but not all of the wall of Jericho collapsed, this reading strategy seems to undermine the thrust of the narrative – that through YHWH's power the wall was completely removed.

⁴¹ In other words, some sort of notion of 'election' is needed in this account – that God manifests himself to particular people and communities at particular times. I do not wish to claim that such manifestation can be 'known' as being such 'from nowhere' on formal grounds; rather it requires an act of acceptance that forms the grounds for the kind of analysis here, even if such manifestation also provides testimony in itself to encourage the acceptance of it as such. In traditional Christian categories such acceptance is accounted for in terms of grace.

⁴² See his Theology of the Old Testament.

primarily to take the narrative, as narrative, in the ‘literal sense’ of its locutions and in all its particularity as being the place in which one, in some sense, expects to locate its ‘normative’ or ‘authoritative’ significance, with a response called forth from this level of significance? Or, following the lead of Nicholas Lash as read through the existential account of myth developed in chapter 2, once one understands ‘what was once achieved, intended or “shown”’ by the book of Joshua, as discovered in terms of concrete expressions of actual human practice and behaviour, expressions and practices that are themselves appropriations of the symbolic sense of concrete expressions of human practices and behaviour portrayed in the world of the text, is the task then to consider how what the narrative witnesses to in this sense might be faithfully and appropriately expressed today, both symbolically and in terms of actual practice and behaviour when developed and read through the further testimony of the tradition (and thus manifestation of God), with the narrative of Joshua forming an important part of the ‘cultural memory’ of the community that cherishes the text?⁴³ With regard to Joshua it would appear that it is mostly the latter,⁴⁴ as I shall now seek to clarify.

The question is made more complex not just because of differences in cultural context, where differences in interpretation may arise simply from different forms of concrete practices, but also as regards the normativity of what is witnessed to, particularly for a text that relates to the Old Covenant – it might have an intrinsic theological ‘oldness’ that restricts its significance to the context of the Old Covenant. From the perspective of cultural memory the text would still be important, as it narrates the roots and identity of the Christian community, even if it might not have significance beyond this. But these questions must, first of all, be considered in the light of further manifestation of the divine. Discernment, often of a theological nature, is thus required in interpretation; to what extent does not just the narrative, but what the narrative witnesses to,⁴⁵ resonate with the testimony and witness of the Christian tradition, and in particular, to the witness of God in Christ, even if Joshua might ‘push’ such a later witness in challenging and demanding ways?⁴⁶ So what is required, if enduring normative significance (in some existential or theological sense perhaps) is to be found, is that in this engagement of ‘testimony with testimony’ sympathetic ‘resonances’ exist between Joshua, later aspects of the tradition (the canon in particular), and the contemporary context as one seeks to probe the ‘world of the text’ and its appropriation in all its fullness.

⁴³ N. Lash, ‘What might Martyrdom mean?’, in Theology on the Way to Emmaus (London: SCM, 1986), pp.75-92, here pp.89-91.

⁴⁴ In other biblical texts, such as the gospels, the balance may look rather different, with a greater emphasis on the ‘literal sense’ of the narrative. I wish to leave this as an open question requiring further exploration.

⁴⁵ I.e., what is ‘beneath the surface’, although often it will not be possible to distinguish the narrative from what the narrative witnesses to at all sharply in the sense that the narrative gives content to what is ‘beneath’ it. Again, it is a matter of sensitivity and discernment to identify the locus of the enduring significance of the material.

But when the narrative ‘world of the text’ of Joshua confronts the world of the reader situated in a different cultural context, what the narrative witnesses to, i.e., ‘what was once achieved, intended or ‘shown’ by the book of Joshua in terms of concrete expressions of human practice and behaviour that are reflected in the narrative might need to be re-expressed faithfully today in concrete expressions of human practice and behaviour that are very different. If, as I shall argue, Joshua is primarily concerned with questions of the identity and character of Israel, then its contemporary interpretation may not then be concerned necessarily with questions like, ‘What does it mean to practice חַרֵּם today?’, or perhaps even, ‘What does it mean to put away idols today?’ – questions that focus on interpretation at the narrative level. Instead, perhaps the focus will be on questions like, ‘What does it mean to respond faithfully to God today?’ and, ‘What is it that constitutes the identity of God’s people today, and how should those who consider themselves to be inside this community live and relate to those seemingly outside this community?’, for these are the kinds of questions that reflect what Joshua sought to address in the concrete aspects of ancient Israelite life.⁴⁷ To tackle these questions today with respect to our communities is to interpret Joshua today.

⁴⁶ I.e., Joshua needs to be given space to say something ‘in its own right’ - a criterion for discernment is not just to ask whether what it says may be gleaned from elsewhere, in the NT for example.

⁴⁷ Cf. Lash: ‘What might “witness” or “martyrdom” mean, today? The form of the question, derived from models of interpretation the inadequacy of which I have tried to indicate, is unsatisfactory. It should rather be: What form might contemporary fidelity to “the testimony of Jesus” appropriately take? And this is a practical and not merely a theoretical question. It is a question that will continue, often in darkness, strenuously to engage all those resources of integrity and discernment without which patterns of human action are not responsibly undertaken or pursued. And it will also continue to engage all those resources of textual, historical and literary criticism without which the New Testament scholar cannot competently perform his indispensable function. That function, I have suggested, is an aspect, but only an aspect, of the

As I noted earlier, perhaps, to use the traditional Christian grammar, this is akin to the ‘spiritual’ or ‘figural’ sense of Joshua, the need for which was recognized precisely in a close reading of the literal sense of the text – and a realization that this was problematic. ‘Spiritual reading’ of Joshua attempted to re-express in concrete ways in the Christian context what it was that Joshua witnessed to, recognizing that the text needed to be re-expressed using new symbols and enacted existentially if it was to be used faithfully, and attention to such reading strategies force one to consider what the text is really ‘about’;⁴⁸ and this is where neo-structuralist analysis, relating to the construction of identity, or psychological analysis, reflecting desire, for example, come in.⁴⁹ However, the possibility remains that an Old Testament text is rendered otiose in the Christian context, finding its significance in the limited yet important sense indicated by cultural memory.⁵⁰

3.3 The life of symbols

Possibly the most important single aspect of this process of appropriation concerns the use of symbols, and is one of the biggest difficulties that the interpreter will encounter. This is for a number of reasons: symbols are contextual, and it is only by ‘living with’ the ‘concrete’ aspect of the symbol that one is led beyond its ‘first-order’ sense and an understanding of what it expresses; but symbols are polyvalent by nature, and also affective, suggesting that their meaning cannot be exhausted noetically; they are prone to ossification with corresponding loss of meaning; but their meaning can be inverted in new contexts,⁵¹ and they are important as part of a cultural memory.

broader task of Christian interpretative practice, of the attempt to bear witness faithfully and effectively to God’s transformative purpose and meaning for mankind.’ (Martyrdom, pp.91-92).

⁴⁸ For example, the film Titanic (Twentieth Century Fox and Paramount Pictures, 1997, dir. James Cameron) is really ‘about’ a tragic love story rather than the maiden voyage of the Titanic, even though it is set in this context. I am grateful to my colleagues at the Biblical Hermeneutics seminar at Spurgeon’s College in 2003-2004 for this observation. Similarly whilst Joshua is set in the context of conquest, it may not really be about conquest.

⁴⁹ I shall argue that there were significant inadequacies in such readings whilst they pointed in the right direction and had the right instincts, unlike much modernist interpretation.

⁵⁰ I argue elsewhere (‘Towards a Christian Hermeneutic of Old Testament Narrative: Why Genesis 34 fails to find Christian Significance’ (forthcoming)) that this is the case with Gen. 34 since the text is problematic at narrative and structural levels in the Christian context.

⁵¹ E.g. the ‘symbol’ of the dispossession of the Canaanites in Joshua has very different meanings depending on whether one reads it with Israelite or Canaanite eyes.

In the context of symbols used of God, the problem is tackled by Sallie McFague, who is concerned that ‘models of God’ (to use her term) become idolatrous or irrelevant.⁵² She suggests,

We are concerned, in part, not only to avoid idolatry—any identification of our words or traditions with being-itself—but also to show the relevance of the Christian tradition to those whose experience the tradition has rejected or distorted. Therefore, Ricoeur’s correction of Gadamer is critical to us. For ... if the Bible is understood as a poetic classic or classic model, its metaphorical characteristics mean that tension, dialectic, openness, change, growth, and relativity must be intrinsic to a proper understanding of its authority. Thus, reform and revolution, perhaps one or both, are features integral to biblical authority. To question linguistic distortions within Scripture and the tradition would not be alien or wrong, but precisely what is called for, given the particular kind of text the Bible is and its authority. To see false consciousness, to unearth deceptions and prejudices due to cultural biases, to substitute revised metaphors and models for distorted ones—all of this would be not only permissible but what a theology based on Scripture as poetic classic must do. Metaphorical theology, most basically, insists on the dialectic of the positive and the negative, on the “is and is not,” and that tension permeates every aspect of it.⁵³

But the difficulty of using symbols to speak of God is raised much earlier, for example in the treatment of Ex.15:3, ‘YHWH is a man of war; YHWH is his name’ in Shirata IV of the Mekhilta according to Rabbi Ishmael,⁵⁴ which I would like to consider carefully. Here, a number of scriptural texts that offer different metaphorical descriptions of YHWH as a warrior are reviewed (none of which, interestingly, include Joshua⁵⁵) whilst considering various parallels at a human level for understanding what a ‘man of war’ is like. But the repeated refrain, ‘But the One who spoke and brought the world into being is not that way’ demonstrates a profound sensitivity to the nature of metaphor and religious language here – God is not like human pictures of a ‘man of war’, although in another sense ‘he is’. This is precisely how symbol and metaphor may be understood – something that ‘is’ and ‘is not’, but opens up the possibilities of new ways of thinking and feeling about something difficult to apprehend. Moreover, the conclusion, ‘If the Israelites are in need, the Omnipresent makes war for them’ is most important. The perception of YHWH as fighting on one’s behalf is limited to the context of the ‘needy’ (and here, specifically, needy Israel). It is not used in relation to stances of power or aggression; YHWH does not fight as the aggressor on campaigns of conquest, which might explain the lack of ⁵² S. McFague, Metaphorical Theology: Models of God in Religious Language (Philadelphia: Fortress Press, 1982), pp.2 & 145.

⁵³ Ibid, pp.64-65. I think that she rather overstates the case, but I wish to take her general point.

⁵⁴ See e.g. J. Neusner, Mekhilta according to Rabbi Ishmael: An Analytic Translation (Brown Judaica Studies 148, Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1988), vol. 1.

⁵⁵ This seems significant granted the parallel of the Jordan crossing with the Red Sea crossing, and the numerous places in Joshua that one might expect the rabbis to explore in this context.

reference to Joshua here. Moreover, YHWH's fighting is also motivated by love; 'How then can Scripture say, 'The Lord is a man of war'? "On account of the love that I bear for you, and on account of the sanctification that you bear, I shall sanctify my name through you." (IV.5.C-D).⁵⁶ This section of the Shirata moves to a conclusion by combining the two parts of the lemma, 'The Lord is his name: With his name he makes war, and he hardly needs any of those measures'. This is the conclusion of a discussion of the means by which YHWH fights, re-interpreting the various scriptural metaphors. Moreover, in closing (IV.6.C), the role of Israel in such warfare is indicated with three scriptural citations indicating that Israel's role is to call upon the name of the Lord (1 Sam. 17:45; Ps. 20:8; 2 Chr. 14:10). Thus the mode by which YHWH is understood to fight, and how Israel is to participate in this, is reconfigured, and this seems to be the point of this part of the Shirata. As Jacob Neusner comments,

This stunning and moving composition holds together, beginning to end, in a sequence of elegant and powerful constructions. ... We start with a specification that the Lord is master of all media of war, we end with the conclusion that the Lord needs none of those media. We identify the Lord as a man of war, but then show that the Lord is in no way comparable to a man of war, making war in a supernatural way, specifically by retaining, even while making war, the attributes of mercy and humanity. So God exhibits all manner of attributes, No. 1, but needs none of them. And however multifarious the attributes, it is always one and the same God, so. No. 2. the sustained and exquisite exercises, Nos. 3, 4, with their recurrent patterns, then undertake that comparison and contrast that shows God to be like the man of war, yet wholly other. It seems to me that the compilers of these materials ... have formed a composition of enormous strength and cogency and made a fundamental point and fully articulated it in detail.⁵⁷

Thus we discover a profound appreciation of the nature and value of religious language, and an indication of how difficult symbols may be dealt with in imaginative ways that are faithful to the tradition that leads to further affectual and existential meditation on the symbol, and on the nature of God – an exploration of the plenitude of the symbol in ways fitting with the tradition.

It is interesting to compare such a treatment with Origen's treatment of Josh. 10:40-43:

I myself think it is better that the Israelite wars be understood in this way, and it is better that Jesus [Joshua] is thought to fight in this way [that the names of the cities carry a spiritual significance] and to destroy cities and overthrow kingdoms. For in this manner what is said will also appear more devout and more merciful, when he is said to have so subverted and devastated individual cities that "nothing that breathed was left in them, neither any who might be saved nor any who might escape." Would that the Lord might thus cast out and extinguish all former evils from the souls who believe in him—even those he claims for his kingdom—and from my own soul, its own evils; so that nothing of a malicious inclination may continue to breathe in me, nothing of wrath; so that no disposition of desire for any evil may be preserved in me, and no wicked word “may remain to escape” from my mouth. For thus, purged from all former evils and under the leadership of Jesus, I can be included among the cities of the sons of Israel, concerning which it is written, “The cities of Judah will be raised up and they will dwell in them.”⁵⁸

⁵⁶ Ibid, p.195.

⁵⁷ Ibid, pp.195-196.

In both Origen’s homily and the Shirata, an ethical concern leads to an imaginative, yet traditionally stable, construal of the texts within a wider (scriptural) frame of reference that is generative of new ways of saying something further about God and his relationship with humanity, and thus, arguably, ‘revelatory’. In the Shirata, there is a ‘corporate’ concern; that YHWH fights for Israel when in need, whereas in Origen, it is a more individual concern that is spiritualized with YHWH fighting for ‘my soul’, against the evils within. But what is interesting is that during this phase of the traditions, both Jewish and Christian readings reflect an ethical sensitivity that leads interpreters to understand the text’s significance to be other than that which a ‘straightforward’ reading of the text would suggest, even if it remains rooted in the symbol. This is a rather different approach from Calvin’s, for example,⁵⁹ and from interpreters in the modern period, an approach (or approaches) that reflect the ossification of the symbol and the myth; a form of idolatry perhaps, in McFague’s terms.

Thus symbols need imaginative, careful treatment. Naim Stifan Ateek, a Palestinian Christian, highlights the problematic nature of the symbolism of the Old Testament when used in new contexts, especially in a Palestinian context today. He notes that if some parts of [the Bible] are applied literally to our situation [as Palestinians] today the Bible appears to offer to the Palestinians slavery rather than freedom, injustice rather than justice, and death to their national and political life. Many good-hearted Christians have been confused or misled by certain biblical words and images that are normally used in public worship; words that have acquired new connotations since the establishment of the state of Israel. For example, when Christians recite the Benedictus, with its opening lines “Blessed be the Lord God of Israel, for he has visited and redeemed his people,” what does it mean for them today? Which Israel are they thinking of? What redemption?⁶⁰

Here, he cites Arnold Toynbee to illustrate the problem of the symbol Israel:

This traditional spiritual connotation of the name “Israel” has been supplanted today by a political and military connotation. Today, if I go to church and try to join in the singing of the Psalms, I am pulled up short, with a jar, when the name “Israel” comes on to my lips. The name conjures up today a picture of a small, middle-Europe type state, with bickering political parties like all such states, with a rigid— and unsuccessful—foreign policy with respect to its neighbours and with constant ⁵⁸ Hom. Josh. 13.3, p.127.

⁵⁹ Calvin gives priority to a different theological frame of reference in his hermeneutics – that of Rom. 9:20-21, which allows God to do what he wants, and suggests that we should not complain (Commentaries on the Book of Joshua, (Grand Rapids: W.B. Eerdmans, ET:1949), p.164).

⁶⁰ N. S. Ateek, Justice and only Justice: A Palestinian Theology of Liberation (Maryknoll: Orbis Books, 1989), pp. 75-76.

appeal to the Jews of the world either to send them money or to come themselves. This picture has now effaced that one in our minds. It has effaced it, whoever we are: Jews or Christians, diaspora Jews or Israelis, believers or agnostics. The present-day political Israel has, for all of us, obliterated or, at least, adumbrated, the spiritual Israel of the Judeo-Christian tradition. This is surely a tragedy.⁶¹

Ateek continues that since the establishment of the State of Israel ‘many previously hidden problems [in the Bible] suddenly surfaced. The God of the Bible, hitherto the God who saves and liberates, has come to be viewed by Palestinians as partial and discriminating. ... [Allegorization and spiritualization] do not meet the challenge of the political abuse of the Bible.’⁶²

Ateek raises some real, searching difficulties here regarding the appropriation of the symbol of Israel, let alone the Canaanites and their genocide. However, there are difficulties with Toynbee and Ateek’s comments, for it seems that the ‘traditional spiritual connotation of the name “Israel”’ as formed in the liturgy is in fact precisely a spiritualized interpretation of the ‘Israel’ portrayed in the Old Testament; from what we know of the history of ancient Israel it is hard to avoid the conclusion that ancient Israel was not altogether unlike ‘a small, middle-Europe type state, with bickering political parties like all such states, with a rigid—and unsuccessful—foreign policy with respect to its neighbours’. In other words, the reality of such symbolism when it is not, in some sense, construed in a ‘second-order’ or ‘spiritual’ sense is probably always rather messier, and perhaps more idolatrous, than one might like.⁶³

But regarding the symbolism of the inhabitants of the land, Ateek notes that ‘some contemporary Jewish militants have debated the use of “genocide” to deal with the Arab problem’, such as Rabbi Moshe Segal who compared the Palestinian residents of the West Bank and Gaza to the Amalekites.⁶⁴ Ateek notes that by labelling the Palestinians as “Amalek” ‘they do not fall under the category of “all creatures” and therefore “mercy” does not apply to them.’ Rabbi Segal is not alone, Ateek notes, since Rabbi Israel Hess

⁶¹ From Elmer Berger, Prophecy, Zionism and the State of Israel, introduction by Arnold J. Toynbee, cited in Ateek, Justice, p.76.

⁶² Ibid, pp.77-78.

⁶³ I do not wish to denigrate the very real problems that Ateek raises, but I do wish to show that the problems can look rather different.

⁶⁴ R.I Friedman, “No Land, No Peace for Palestinians” in The Nation (April 23, 1988), p.563), in Ateek, Justice, p.84.

published an article 'The Genocide Ruling of the Torah' in which he also compared the Arabs to Amalek and stated that their extermination has been mandated by the Torah.⁶⁵ This is comparable with some instances of the 'Christian' use of Joshua, such as by the Puritan emigrants to America.⁶⁶ The Shirata, Origen, Rabbi Segal, Rabbi Hess and the Puritan emigrants all exhibit a desire to imaginatively explore the plenitude of various symbols to suit the use and needs of a particular context. What sets them apart, however, is the 'fittingness' of their exploration of the symbolism with regard to its use in the original text, and with respect to the wider canon of Scripture and the tradition of its reception and use. This is why some readings should be rejected, even as readings such as these demonstrate the potential and problems of symbols.

3.4 Summary

I have sought to develop the question of how we 'learn about our learning' beyond the largely descriptive and phenomenological aspects studied in chapter 2 to consider the sense in which our learning can be said to be truly 'revelatory' and not the result of a false consciousness. I developed first the notions of plenitude and fittingness as categories by which the significance of a 'mythical' text is explored, before turning to consider how ideas of manifestation and testimony can help to foster a well-founded attitude of trustworthiness towards toward such a text together with the tradition associated with its use, whilst also indicating where this might need correction. It is in the use of a text, and its juxtaposition with other 'myths' that what is of enduring significance in the world of the text is manifested and crystallized, and its 'revelatory significance' developed. But this is not to argue for an 'evolutionary positivism', for as we have seen, it is possible to read and use texts badly, which is why criteria of testimony and 'fittingness' are required.

Indeed, we have seen that 'traditionality' is a complex notion, involving a dialectic between innovation and sedimentation, which works to assist in the formation of a constructive appropriation of a text such as Joshua through a field of tension between the text, Joshua, as an act of discourse, and its juxtaposition with other texts and their use in the later tradition, in which the canonical context is one of particular hermeneutical significance, and with the contemporary horizons and concerns of the interpreter. The good interpretation of different texts will involve the relative privileging of different 'poles' in this process, requiring a questioning, attentive stance on the part of the interpreter. Working in this way the text may be appropriated in innovative yet faithful and fitting ways that are generative of human transformation towards its telos in God. The 'poles' of the 'final form' of the text and of the 'canonical form' are privileged, but not determinative.

⁶⁵ Ateek, Justice, p.85, again citing Friedman.

⁶⁶ Cf. R.A. Warrior, 'Canaanites, Cowboys and Indians: Deliverance, Conquest, and Liberation Theology Today' in D. Jobling, et al. (eds), The Postmodern Bible Reader (Oxford: Blackwell, 2001), pp.188-194.

Moreover, we saw that it is neither possible nor necessary to know and understand fully the precise historical circumstances that resulted in the production of a text in order to understand it as an act of discourse; rather, it is an awareness of the traditions, and 'public codes of production', in which the text is situated that provide the basis for understanding the text as discourse and making it intelligible so as to be able to read and appropriate it well.

We also considered different ways in which a mythical text might find significance, such as at the narrative level or at some level 'beneath' the narrative, such as what it sought to achieve and how this might be reflected in different contexts. This raised the possibility that certain texts, such as Gen. 34, might be rendered otiose in the context of the New Covenant in any sense beyond that of its place in the cultural memory of the church, which is, nonetheless, still an important role. Finally, we turned to the interpretation of symbols as a particularly important illustration, and building block, of this process of appropriation.

Section II

Making Joshua intelligible as discourse:

Starting to read well

I suggested in chapter 3 that in order to read and appropriate Joshua well, it is necessary to understand it as an act of discourse that is embedded in a tradition that reflects various public ‘codes of production’. In this section I wish to develop this in relation to Joshua, considering three areas that are of particular importance; first, the general nature of the tradition(s) that Joshua is embedded in; secondly, the slightly more specific question of Joshua’s genre and its relation to ‘conquest accounts’, and thirdly the specific question of the significance of מלחמה, being, perhaps, the major theme of Joshua.

Chapter 4

Joshua as part of tradition(s)

What counts as sufficient knowledge of Joshua's historical context to make it intelligible? I suggested that it may be beneficial to situate the work within the tradition that generated and received it so as to understand the kinds of issues that are at work in the text. Such attention establishes an understanding of the text that will provide a sense of 'fittingness' by which the 'plenitude' of imaginative readings of the text in other contexts may be judged – it reveals the 'world of the text' and indicates the kind of boundaries that one might expect its interpretation to have when it is appropriated in new contexts.

4.1 The compositional history of Joshua

I would like to begin by considering the composition of Joshua as identified in recent German scholarship as a means of considering the tradition of which it is a part, and thus the concerns that are likely to be reflected in the text. Volkmar Fritz considers Joshua to be the product of a basic DtrG/H account subsequently redacted through what he terms a later deuteronomistic RedD stage, a RedP (priestly) stage and through 'redactions of a different kind' (Redaktionelle Zusätze verschiedener Art), and provides a detailed analysis of and commentary on the book based upon these assumed layers.¹ Michaël van der Meer offers a more detailed analysis of certain sections of Joshua, introducing a pre-deuteronomistic level of composition, and traces pre-Dtr, DtrH, DtrN, RedP and Proto-MT layers.² Indeed, attempts to trace and refine compositional 'layers' abound. For example, with regard to Josh. 6, Schwienhorst claims to detect a basic ancient account, a Yahwist redaction, subsequent DtrH, DtrP and DtrN redactions, followed by various post-deuteronomistic glosses and additions.³ But as Römer & de Pury observe with regard to the reconstruction of multiple levels of the deuteronomistic material, 'The attribution of texts to one of these multiple levels risks therefore being done according to more and more arbitrary criteria and leads to allocations that are less and less verifiable.’⁴

¹ V. Fritz, Das Buch Josua (HAT I/7) (Tübingen: J.C.B. Mohr (Paul Siebeck), 1994). Whilst identifying these redactional layers, unlike other commentators he appears to leave the question of their dating open. A weakness identified in Fritz' approach is his lack of concern with the LXX (A.G. Auld, Joshua Retold: Synoptic Perspectives (Old Testament Studies) (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1998), p.145).

² M.N. van der Meer, Formation and Reformulation: The Redaction of the Book of Joshua in the Light of the oldest Textual Witnesses (Leiden: Brill, 2004).

³ L. Schwienhorst, Die Eroberung Jerichos: Exegetische Untersuchung zu Josua 6 (Stuttgart: Katholisches Bibelwerk, 1986).

Likewise Richard Nelson comments,

Some have proposed dividing DH in Joshua into more than one deuteronomist. However, unlike the situation in Judges or Kings, evidence is lacking in Joshua for a second deuteronomist with a theological viewpoint different from DH or using a distinct vocabulary. The only possible exception might be the addition of chapter 24.⁵

Nelson does, however, recognize the presence of pre-deuteronomistic material in Joshua, but suggests that the deuteronomistic material ‘represents more than just a series of isolated expansions or incidents of retouching, but is a comprehensive redaction or act of authorship’.⁶ This would suggest that the deuteronomistic level(s) of redaction provide a decisive stage of composition - an act of discourse that transforms and shapes whatever earlier materials are used, which would imply that seeking to ‘peer behind’ the deuteronomistic level(s) of composition is unnecessary, and possibly likely to mislead.⁷ However, granted the difficulty in identifying possible levels of deuteronomistic composition, they nonetheless have sufficient ‘family resemblance’ to be labeled ‘deuteronomistic’, and this may be sufficient to make the text intelligible.

However, Nelson notes that the ‘deuteronomistic redactional presence is ... noticeably absent from the description of land distribution (chaps. 13:1-21:42 apart from 14:6-15),’⁸ where he detects priestly language and outlook. Moreover, he detects a number of ‘P-like touches’ elsewhere (e.g. 3:4; 4:19; 9:15b, 18-21) which ‘definitely indicate that priestly redactional interests played a role in the creation of the final form of Joshua.’⁹ Therefore I shall develop, in general terms, the nature and significance of the deuteronomistic and ⁴ T. Römer & A. de Pury, ‘Deuteronomistic Historiography: History of Research and related Issues’, in A. de Pury (et al) (eds), Israel Constructs its History: Deuteronomistic Historiography in Recent Research (JSOTSup 306) (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2000), pp.24-141, here p.72. For a summary of the history of research into the Deuteronomistic History see this, or for a fuller treatment T.C. Römer, The So-Called Deuteronomistic History: A Sociological, Historical and Literary Introduction (London: T&T Clark, 2005). For another perspective, and a theory that seeks to replace that of Martin Noth’s, see K.L. Noll, ‘Deuteronomistic History or Deuteronomic Debate? (A thought experiment)’, in JSOT 31:3 (2007), pp.311-345.

⁵ R.D. Nelson, Joshua (OTL) (Louisville: Westminster John Knox Press, 1997), p.6.

⁶ Ibid., p.6.

⁷ Unless of course Joshua’s significance is to be construed in terms of a ‘historical record’ that might have been distorted by later editors, but as the overall thrust of this thesis shows, this is not the case.

⁸ Ibid., p.6.

⁹ Ibid., p.9.

priestly traditions associated with Joshua,¹⁰ using the studies of Moshe Weinfeld and Joseph Blenkinsopp as starting points.

4.2 The deuteronomistic nature of Joshua

Weinfeld identified the following verses as being indicative of distinctive deuteronomistic language in Joshua:¹¹

Chapter	Verses
1	5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 11, 13, 15, 18
2	11
3
4	24
5	1
6
7	5, 9, 11, 15
8	1, 22, 31, 32
9	24, 27
10	8, 25, 28, 30, 33, 37, 39, 40
11	8, 11, 14
12	6, 7
13
14	8, 9, 14
15
16
17
18	3
19 20
21	42, 43
22	3, 5
23	1, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16
24	2, 7, 14, 16, 17, 18, 31

Table 4.1: Instances of distinctive deuteronomistic language

However, I wish to suggest that some modifications to this list are needed. Whilst Weinfeld does not consider the use ׀ר in Joshua to be distinctively deuteronomistic, I shall argue in chapter 6 that ׀ר as found in Joshua is distinctively deuteronomistic, apart from 6:19 & 24 which appear to be later additions influenced by Lev. 27, and so references to ׀ר are instances of deuteronomistic language. Furthermore, identifying ¹⁰ Generally speaking, I shall not seek to differentiate between layers in the priestly and deuteronomistic materials as I think that this is rather too ambitious a project, and, as the study unfolds it will be seen that this is unnecessary on the whole. I shall draw attention to the few places where it might be important as they arise.

¹¹ See M. Weinfeld, Deuteronomy and the Deuteronomistic School (Oxford: Clarendon, 1972), pp.320-365.

מלא אחר יהוה ('to fill up after', i.e. 'to follow with loyalty/perfection' (Weinfeld)) which occurs in Josh. 14:8, 9, 14 (cf. Deut. 1:36 & Num. 14:24; 32:11-12) as deuteronomistic is questionable;¹² in context, Josh. 14 seems to be referring to, and using, the language of Num. 14, and thus the use of this phrase in Josh. 14 cannot be said to be specifically deuteronomistic. This would suggest that there are in fact only two instances of distinctive deuteronomistic language in Josh. 13:1-21:42, namely Josh. 14:8 & 18:3.

Most significantly, absent is any חרם vocabulary in Josh. 13-22, a root that dominates the accounts of conquest in Josh. 1-11, but is absent in places where one would expect it.¹³ But other deuteronomistic terms are also absent from Josh. 13:1-21:42. There is no language of סור; no references to 'not turning to the left or right' and no references to 'turning away from foreign gods', language used in 23:6 and 24:14, 23. In particular, it is interesting that 13:1-7 does not contain these deuteronomistic features. Also lacking is אמיץ 'be strong' which occurs in Josh. 1:6, 7, 9, 18; 10:25 in relation to 'being strong and courageous'.¹⁴ It is clearly important in Josh. 1, and thus if Josh. 13 in some sense parallels Josh. 1, its absence here is striking. However, it is also lacking in Josh. 23-24, but here חזק (be strong) is used in relation to obeying the law (23:6), as in Josh. 1 (e.g. 1:6-7). Whilst חזק occurs in Josh. 13:1-21:42 (14:11; 17:13, 18) (and P), it only occurs here in connection with military/physical strength and not obeying torah.

Thus absent from Josh. 13:1-21:42 is much of the deuteronomistic language that one might expect if it was deuteronomistic. There are only two instances of only weakly characteristic deuteronomistic features here in 14:8 and 18:3, which might reflect later glosses. Thus Josh. 13:1-21:42 cannot be said to be 'deuteronomistic', and Weinfeld's list needs some revision (see below).

¹² Cf. Ibid, p.337.

¹³ E.g. Josh. 17:13, where ירש (hiphil) with infinitive absolute is used, which reflects the language of Num. 32-33 rather than Ex. 23, suggesting dependency on the Numbers conquest tradition rather than that of Exodus.

¹⁴ Cf. esp. Deut. 31:6-7, 23 (also 2:30, 3:28, 15:7).

4.3 The priestly nature of Joshua

What then of the priestly character of Joshua? Joseph Blenkinsopp argues that 'the tendency to deny to P any significant contribution to [Joshua] ... needs to be reversed',¹⁵ and suggests the following as possible priestly elements:

- Twelve stones set up in the Jordan (4:9)
- Date of the crossing of the Jordan (4:19)
- Celebration of Passover according to the P chronology (5:10-12)
- Covenant with the Gibeonites (9:15-21)
- Completion of the conquest (11:15,20)
- Introduction to the allotment of territory (14:1-5)
- Setting up of the sanctuary at Shiloh (18:1)
- Completion of the allotment of territory (19:51)
- Allotment of levitical cities (21:1.8)
- Decision about the altar of the Transjordanian tribes (22:10-34)
- Death of Phineas (24:33)¹⁶

Moreover, Weinfeld comments that

Traces of the Priestly source are clearly evident in Josh. 14:1-21:40 not only in the terms and expressions employed (cf. 14:1-5; 18:1-10; 19:49-51 and chs. 20—1) but also in the disposition of the material. The material in these chapters has been arranged in the same manner as was the Priestly tradition in Num. 26-36. The partition of the land in the presence of Joshua and Eleazar coupled with the underlying geographical lists in Josh. 14-19 corresponds to the charge of dividing the land and the related genealogical and geographical lists in Num. 26-7, 32-4; the assignment of the cities of refuge and the Levitical towns in Josh. 20-1 is the implementation of the related commands recorded in Num. 35. Josh. 14:1-21:40 in general appear to have been edited by a Priestly redactor and subsequently incorporated en bloc by a deuteronomistic editor.¹⁷

Indeed, the following may be identified as priestly language in Joshua:

עֲדָה

Hurvitz notes that עֲדָה is a 'priestly term',¹⁸ which occurs in Joshua in Josh. 9:15 ,18 (x2), 19, 21, 27; 18:1; 20:6, 9; 22:12, 16, 17, 18, 20, 30, but significantly not in Josh. 7 which Josh. 22 alludes to.

¹⁵ J. Blenkinsopp, 'The Structure of P', in CBQ 38 (1976), pp.275-292, here p.287.

¹⁶ Ibid, pp. 288-289. It is not clear that 11:15 & 20 are particularly priestly however.

¹⁷ Weinfeld, Deuteronomy, p.182. Weinfeld does not see P as presupposing cult centralization in Jerusalem (as opposed, he suggests, to D) (p.183). Moreover, he suggests that 'The redaction of the book of Joshua similarly points to P's preceding D. As it was the Deuteronomist who gave the book its frame (ch. 1 = introduction, ch. 23 = conclusion) we may infer that the Priestly material' was redacted by the deuteronomistic editor and consequently antedated D.' (p.182).

¹⁸ A. Hurvitz, A Linguistic Study of the Relationship between the Priestly Source and the Book of Ezekiel: A New Approach to an Old Problem (Cahiers de la Revue biblique 20) (Paris: J. Gabalda, 1982), p.66.

מקלט

The use of מקלט for 'city of refuge' only occurs in the Old Testament outside Joshua in Num. 35:6, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 25, 26, 27, 28, 32 and 1 Chr 6:42, 52. It occurs in Joshua in Josh. 20:2, 3; 21:13, 21, 27, 32, 38, but, significantly, it does not occur in the deuteronomistic account of the cities of refuge. Thus in this regard Josh. 20-21 follows Numbers not Deuteronomy.¹⁹ Moreover, the use of גר in Josh. 20:9 reflects Num. 15:15-16²⁰ and not the parallel text in Deuteronomy (Deut. 19:1-8 & 4:41-43). Thus Josh. 20-21 reflects the priestly text of Numbers, rather than the parallel text in Deuteronomy.

גורל

Allotment (גורל) occurs 26x in Josh. 13-21 (14:2; 15:1; 16:1; 17:1, 14, 17; 18:6, 8, 10, 11; 19:1, 10, 17, 24, 32, 40, 51; 21:4, 5, 6, 8, 10, 20 & 40). It occurs 5x in Leviticus, 7x in Numbers. It does not occur in Deuteronomy, Kings or Josh. 1-12 and so may be said to be priestly.

כלה and כבש

כבש (subdue) occurs in the summary statement in Josh. 18:1. Although it only occurs once in the book of Joshua, its presence in this summary statement indicates that it is important. Elsewhere it is used in Gen. 1:28, which is significant as it relates to the role of humanity in creation, and in Num. 32:22 & 29, which is again significant as Josh. 18:1 represents the fulfilment of Num. 32. It occurs a further 9x in the Old Testament, but not in Deuteronomy or Kings.²¹ Similarly, Brueggemann has compared the 'finishing' (כלה)

¹⁹ cf. Nelson, Joshua, p.229: the 'unrevised text' (OG) of Josh. 20:1-9 'has its closest relationship to Num. 35:9-15. He notes that Noth argued that Num. 33:50-35:29 is dependent upon Josh. 14-21.

²⁰ 'a priestly concern': Nelson, Joshua, pp.229-230.

²¹ Josh. 10:40-41 uses נכח for subduing or smiting the land, which is common throughout D and P (e.g. Num. 32:4 uses נכח).

of Gen. 2:1, 2 with the completion of the tabernacle (Ex. 39:32; 40:33) and with the 'finishing' of Josh. 19:49-51 as a priestly theme.²²

אהל מועד

אהל מועד (Tent of Meeting) occurs in Josh. 18:1 and 19:51. It occurs many times in Exodus, Leviticus and Numbers, but only once in Deuteronomy (31:14), which Driver suggests is 'in a passage belonging not to D, but to JE'.²³

נשיא

נשיא (leader) occurs in Joshua in 9:15, 18, 19, 21; 13:21; 17:4; 22:14, 30, 32. It is a priestly term, occurring 62x in Numbers, 4x in Exodus, once in Leviticus, being absent in Deuteronomy, and occurring only twice in Samuel-Kings.²⁴

אחזה

אחזה (possession) occurs in Joshua in 21:12, 41; 22:4, 9, 19. It occurs only once in Deuteronomy, in 32:49, but is common in Leviticus and Numbers.

Eleazar the priest

Eleazar the priest, prominent in Numbers but not Deuteronomy, has an important role in Joshua: in 14:1, in allotting inheritance; in 17:4 in the appeal to him by Zelophehad's daughters; in 19:51, in the division of inheritance at Shiloh, and in 21:1 the heads of Levites come to him. He has similar, if not quite equal (cf. 13:1) stature to Joshua in Josh. 13-21.

²² W.A. Brueggemann, Theology of The Old Testament: Testimony, Dispute, Advocacy (Minneapolis: Fortress Press, 1997), p.533. Auld argues that כבש in Gen. 1:28 is a late addition based upon Josh. 18:1 (Joshua Retold, p.66).

²³ S.R. Driver, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on Deuteronomy (The International Critical Commentary) (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 3rd ed. 1902), p.xiii.

²⁴ As with עדה it is interesting that נשיא occurs several times in Josh. 9, suggesting that it has a priestly flavour. However in Josh. 9 we find ברית and כרת (Josh. 9:6, 7, 11, 15, 16), which are not in Leviticus or Numbers, but 13x in Deuteronomy (significantly 7:2) and 6x in Exodus, 7x in Genesis. So the 'body' of Josh. 9 appears to be deuteronomistic as well.

In summary then, I suggest that the following are instances of characteristic deuteronomistic and priestly language in Joshua:²⁵

Chapter	deuteronomistic	priestly
1	5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 11, 13, 15, 18
2	10, 11
3
4	24	9, 19
5	1	10-12*
6	17, 18, 21
7	1, 5, 9, 11, 12, 13, 15
8	1, 22, 26, 31, 32
9	6, 7, 11, 15, 16, 24, 27	15-21, 27
10	1, 8, 25, 28, 30, 33, 35, 37, 39, 40
11	8, 11, 12, 14, 20, 21	15, 20
12	6, 7
13		21
14	8	1-5
15		1
16		1
17		1, 4, 14, 17
18	3	1, 6, 8, 10, 11
19		1, 10, 17, 24, 32, 40, 51
20		2, 3, 6, 9
21	42, 43	1-8, 10, 12, 13, 20, 21, 27, 32, 38, 40, 41
22	3, 5, 20	10-34
23	1, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 11, 12, 13, 13, 14, 15, 16
24	2, 7, 14, 16, 17, 18, 31	33

* Nelson, noting differences between the OG and MT of 5:10-12, suggests that this text has a complicated pre-history in which the MT ‘revision’ (presuming the OG to witness to an earlier text) seeks to improve the orthodoxy of the text and bring it into line with Priestly texts (Joshua, pp.78-80). Thus to call 5:10-12 priestly may be misleading. However, see van der Meer, Formation, p.412, for a different reconstruction of the text’s history.

Table 4.2: Summary of deuteronomistic and priestly language in Joshua

The affinities of 13:1-21:41 with Numbers, rather than with Deuteronomy or Exodus are interesting; the language of entrance to the land reflects Num. 32-33 rather than Ex.23; the account of the cities of refuge in Josh. 20-21 reflects Num. 35 rather than Deut. 4 & 19; the use of כִּבַּשׁ in Josh.18:1 reflects the fulfilment of Num. 32; Caleb’s story reflects Num. 13:1-33 (Caleb is only mentioned briefly in Deuteronomy in 1:36); the story of Zelophehad’s daughters (Josh. 17:3-4) reflects Num. 27:1-11, & 36:1ff; the reference to ²⁵ I do not claim that this is a comprehensive list, but is an indicative sketch of the distribution of what are the most readily identifiable instances of deuteronomistic or priestly language or concerns.

Balaam (Josh. 13:22) reflects Num. 22-24; the prominence of Eleazar the priest (Josh. 14:1; 17:4; 19:51; 21:1 reflects Num. 26:1, 27:2, etc. (he is only mentioned in Deuteronomy in 10:6 in passing.); Phinehas, the son of Eleazar (Josh. 21:1; 22:13, 31, 32; 24:33) again reflects Numbers (Num. 25:7, 11; 21:16) and not Deuteronomy; the status of the Transjordan tribes (Josh. 13:8ff; 22) reflects Num. 32; the Levitical cities (Josh. 21) reflects Num. 35, and the division of the land in Josh. 13-21, and the concern with driving the locals out and taking possession, reflects the fulfilment of Num. 33:50-56, with the boundaries of Josh. 13:1-7 reflecting Num. 34, as Nelson notes, ‘The description of the “land that remains” in [13:]2-6 is coterminous with neither the following tribal allotments nor the deuteronomistic conception of idealized borders. It reflects instead a tradition of expansive borders over much of Syria-Palestine also found in Num. 34:1—12 and Judg. 3:3.’²⁶ Finally, it is interesting to consider the importance of Gilgal and Shiloh in the two ‘sections’ of Joshua: Gilgal is referred to 10x in Josh. 1-12, and twice in 13-21, whilst Shiloh is never referred to Josh. 1-12, but 7x in 13-21, again suggesting something of a partition of the materials.²⁷

4.4 Summary – the significance of the deuteronomistic and priestly natures of Joshua

Joshua appears to comprise of an essentially deuteronomistic section (or sections), namely Josh. 1-12; 21:43-22:9; 23-24, and a priestly section, Josh. 13:1-22:42. The deuteronomistic section reflects the concerns of Deuteronomy, and Deut. 7 especially, whilst the priestly section reflects priestly concerns, and Numbers in particular.

I do not wish to try to probe Joshua’s compositional history further than this. All I wish to observe is that Joshua reflects the conflation of a deuteronomistic account of entrance to the land and a priestly account of the settlement of the land. These were probably redacted into the final form of the book by another author located more in the deuteronomistic tradition, given that the significant summaries and frames of the book are strongly deuteronomistic (e.g. Josh. 1; 21:43-22:9; 23), whilst Josh. 13:1-22:42 was probably not placed in the book at an 'original' stage of deuteronomistic composition, for the deuteronomist uses חֲרָם language in narrating the entrance to the land, and is not afraid to re-tell other stories using such חֲרָם language (e.g. Deut. 2-3 cf. Num. 21:21-35), but such language, along with other deuteronomistic language, is absent here. However, the final form also shows signs of priestly editing ('light touches' as Nelson describes them), such as Josh. 6:19 & 24, and perhaps the מַעַל language of Josh. 7, although the use of priestly language in Josh. 9 is interesting, and is, perhaps best accounted for via the use of a common, earlier tradition that did not find its way into most of the deuteronomistic literature.

²⁶ Nelson, Joshua, p.164. Auld argues that Josh. 13-21 and the end of Numbers were drafted and re-drafted alongside each other, and so emerged together (A.G. Auld, Joshua, Moses and the Land (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1980)).

²⁷ But cf. chapter 7 for the possibility of some references to Gilgal as being late.

What I wish to draw from this relates to the idea of testimony on the one hand, and appreciating how to read a text well on the other. Regarding reading the text well, knowing that Josh. 1-12; 21:43-22:6; 23-24 is deuteronomistic suggests that it may be read well with deuteronomistic concerns in view. Thus one would expect to read the text in terms of obedience to the law and the avoidance of idolatry for example. Similarly, knowing that Josh. 13-21:42 & 22:10-34 is priestly suggests that one would expect to read the text well in terms of purity of the land for example. Moreover, one is invited to read Josh. 18:1 & 19:49-51 in terms of the priestly creation narrative in which the settlement of the land is viewed as, in some sense, reflecting the completion of creation and the fulfillment of the divine command to subdue the land; Joshua interprets and is interpreted by Genesis. Thus the text represents the testimony of two traditions to the manifestation (in some sense) of the divine in Israel, and what constitutes an adequate response to such manifestation.

But the synthesis of these deuteronomistic and priestly traditions in Joshua is significant, for it is testimony to the compatibility of these two traditions that offer two perspectives on the early life of Israel in the land, and Joshua has the weight of the assent of two major strands of Israelite tradition in its favour, testifying to the discernment of the manifestation of the divine in Israel. The two testimonies thus mutually reinforce and complement each other, providing testimony to the revelatory character of the material in Joshua, for here we have two traditions that are usually discussed in isolation that are synthesized in Joshua. But as well as being mutually reinforcing, the fusion of these two traditions in Joshua reflects a new act of discourse that invites one to read the whole of Joshua from a broader perspective; it invites the priestly material to be read from a deuteronomistic perspective and vice versa. This ‘testimony’ is testimony to the opening up of new interpretative possibilities as these two testimonies to the same divine reality (viewed from different perspectives) coalesce, and invite an exploration of the ‘plenitude’ of the texts of each tradition in new ways, an innovation in the tradition. So, for example, one could construe the settlement of the land as the fulfillment of the creation mandate to ‘subdue’ the land in terms of the eradication of idolatry and obedience to God. However, as will become clear in chapter 6 when we consider חרם, it is important to consider the text from the perspective of the traditions with respect to which the text arose first in order to read it well, so as to consider how it might be appropriated and read well at a later point in the tradition when the traditions have merged, reflecting the ‘field of tension’ that the interpreter must work in that I discussed in chapter 3. But first, we shall consider questions relating to Joshua’s genre.

Chapter 5

The genre of Joshua – codes of production and use of literary conventions

Considering Joshua ‘as myth’ has done much to elucidate the genre of Joshua, and thus indicate how to read it well. But might one say more regarding particular ‘composition codes’ associated with Joshua, a consideration of which might contribute to the generation of its meaning?¹ One approach to the question of ‘composition codes’, or perhaps one might say genre, in relation to Joshua has been through studying ANE ‘conquest accounts’, such as by K. Lawson Younger Jr. who compares Josh. 9-12 with ANE ‘conquest accounts’.²

5.1 Similarities between Joshua and ANE conquest accounts

Younger cites a number of examples of ANE texts that have significant resonances with Josh. 9-12. For example, there are some similarities of Josh. 10 with Assyrian Royal Inscriptions, such as in the Annals of Tiglath-Pileser I:

With my valorous onslaught I went a second time to the land of Kadmuḫu.
I conquered all their cities.
I carried off without number their booty, possessions, and property.
I burned, razed (and) destroyed their cities.
Now the remainder of their troops, which had taken fright at my fierce weapons and had been cowed by my strong and belligerent attack, in order to save their lives took to secure heights in rough mountainous terrain.
I climbed up after them to the peaks of high mountains and perilous mountain ledges where a man could not walk. They waged war, combat, and battle with me; (and) I inflicted a decisive defeat on them.
I piled up the corpses of their warriors on mountain ledges like the Inundator (i.e. Adad).
I made their blood flow into the hollows and plains of the mountains.
I bro[u]ght do[wn] their booty, possessions and property from the secure heights of the mountains.
(Thus) I ruled over the entire land of Kadmuḫu; and I annexed (it) to the borders of my land.³

Furthermore the Hittite Detailed Annals of Muršili II provides an interesting comparison with the story of the Gibeonites:

When the people of the city of Azzi saw that fighting (their) strong cities I subjugated them:
—the people of Azzi, who have strong cities, rocky mountains, (and) high difficult terrain—they were afraid!

¹ Cf. the discussion of Paul Ricoeur’s work in 3.1. ‘Composition codes’ reflect the existence of tacit public agreements relating to factors such as genre that influence how a work is understood.

² K. Lawson Younger Jr., Ancient Conquest Accounts: A Study in Ancient Near Eastern and Biblical History Writing (JSOTSup 98) (Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1990) (hereafter ACA). I shall assume here that it is possible to identify ‘conquest account’ as a genre, following Younger.

³ Aššur prism, III.7-31, in ACA, pp.83-84.

And the elders of the land came before me, and they bowed themselves down at (my) feet.

And they spoke:

“Our lord! Do not destroy us!

Lord, take us into servitude, and we will begin to provide to (your) lordship troops and charioteers.

The Hittite fugitives which (are) with us, we will provide these.”

Then I, my sun, did not destroy them.

I took them into servitude;

and I made them slaves.⁴

Likewise an Egyptian text of Ramesses III's account of his victory over the Libyans in the 5th year at Medinet Habu also has some resonances with the story of the Gibeonites:

... we were trapped, they drew us in like a net. The gods caused us to succeed, indeed, (merely) to offer us up, to overthrow us for Egypt! (So,) let us make a brt (a treaty) with [the Egyptians (?) before they de]stroy us ...

... your terror seizes them, cowed, miserable and straying. They all make a brt (a treaty), bringing their tribute [on their backs ..., and coming with prai]se to adore [him = the king].⁵

We see the motifs of terror and fear here, which is commonly reflected elsewhere too.⁶

Moreover, several motifs that occur in Josh. 10 reflect Sargon's Letter to God:

Metatti, (the ruler) of Zikirtu, together with the kings of his neighboring regions I felled their assembly (of troops). And I broke up their organized ranks. I brought about the defeat of the armies of Urartu, the wicked enemy, together with its allies. In the midst of Mt. Uauš he came to a stop. I filled the mountain ravines and wadis with their horses. And they, like ants in straits, squeezed through narrow paths. In the heat of my mighty weapons I climbed up after him; and I filled ascents and descents with the bodies of (their) fighters. Over 6 'double hours' of ground from Mt. Uauš to Mt. Zimur, the jasper mountain, I pursued them at the point of the javelin. The rest of the people, who had fled to save their lives, whom he had abandoned that the glorious might of Aššur my lord, might be magnified, Adad, the violent, the son of Anu, the valiant, uttered his loud cry against them; and with the flood cloud and hail-stones (lit. 'the stone of heaven' [NA, AN-e]), he totally annihilated [qatu] the remainder. Rusa, their prince, who had transgressed against Samaš and Marduk, who had not kept sacred the oath of Aššur, the king of the gods, became afraid at the noise of my mighty weapons; and his heart palpitated like that of a partridge fleeing before the eagle. Like a man whose blood is pouring out from him, he left Turuspâ, his royal city. Like a roaming fugitive he hid in the recesses of his mountain. Like a woman in confinement he became bedridden. Food and water he refused in his mouth. And thus he brought a permanent illness upon himself. *I established the glorious might of Aššur my lord, for all time to come upon Urartu. I left behind a terror never to be forgotten in the future.*⁷

Here we find hailstones as a 'divine weapon', annihilation of the enemy (but not with the root חָרַם or equivalent⁸), fleeing and hiding in a mountain, and terror and fear, as per Josh. 10. Thus, as Younger argues, a number of motifs in Joshua seem to represent standard ways of telling certain types of story, an observation that Rowlett develops in

⁴ KBo IV 4 Rs IV.28-37 in ACA, p.159.

⁵ From KRI V, pp.58-66 in ACA, p.204.

⁶ ACA, pp.221-222.

⁷ From MDOG 115 (1983), pp.82-83, in ACA, p.210.

⁸ חָרַם occurs in the Mesha Inscription; see chapter 6.

order to consider the ideological significance of Joshua,⁹ and that we have instances of 'mythical' (in the more traditional sense of the word) motifs in Joshua that reflect their usage elsewhere.

Moreover, if one looks further than Younger's study, Joshua has resonances with other ANE texts. Fleming compares the collapsing walls of Jericho with ARM 1 135:8-10, where Išme-Dagan announces that he made the wall of Qirhadat fall, although 'by breaches'.¹⁰ He also notes that with regard to the ark, sacred personnel are essential to any movement of Yahweh's cultic presence, 'as they would be for the transportation of divine statues in the wider ancient Near East'.¹¹

5.2 Differences between Joshua and ANE conquest accounts

However, these similarities should not obscure the many differences. First, the account of the fall of Jericho in Josh. 6 is not a siege account, and I am not aware of any extant ANE account that is quite like the fall of Jericho.¹² Secondly, the only references to חָרַם (or lexical equivalents) outside the Old Testament are found in the Mesha Inscription and in the Ugartic 'Incantation against Infertility' (KTU 1.13);¹³ it is a very rare way of describing warfare or conquest in the ANE. Thirdly, the Assyrian sources especially, whilst similar in reporting mass destruction, differ from Joshua in that they are usually narrated in the first person (perhaps suggesting that they exist to bolster the reputation of the king) and contain far more graphic accounts of slaughter than Joshua does; it is interesting that they often use simile and metaphor to do this, something absent from Joshua. For example, in the Gabal Barkal Stela of Thutmose III; 'I slaughtered them (the enemy) like they had never existed, prostrating them in their blood, casting (them) down

⁹ L.L. Rowlett, 'Inclusion, Exclusion and Marginality in the Book of Joshua', in JSOT 55 (1992), pp.15-23 & L.L. Rowlett, Joshua and the Rhetoric of Violence: A New Historicist Analysis (JSOTSup 226) (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1996), e.g. p.64.

¹⁰ D.E. Fleming, 'The Seven-Day Siege of Jericho in Holy War' in R.Chazan (et al) (eds), Ki Baruch Hu: Ancient Near Eastern, Biblical and Judaic Studies in honour of Baruch A. Levine (Winona Lake: Eisenbrauns, 1999), pp.211-228, here pp.216-217. He notes that in Akkadian texts the 'collapse' of a city wall describes a victorious siege (see CAD maqatu 1a) (p.216).

¹¹ Ibid. p.217.

¹² One would expect accounts narrating the collapse of walls elsewhere, as this is simply a means of overthrowing a city.

¹³ See chapter 6.

in heaps’;¹⁴ in the Annals of Tiglath-Pileser I, ‘The corpses of their warriors I laid out like grain heaps on the open country’,¹⁵ and ‘I piled up the corpses of their warriors on mountain ledges like the Inundator (i.e. Adad). I made their blood flow into the hollows and plains of the mountains’,¹⁶ and Sennacherib claims, ‘I harvested their skulls like shrivelled grain and I piled (them) into heaps’.¹⁷ Fourthly, the Hittite accounts, whilst not always narrated in the first person, tend to report the capture of people and not their destruction even though they regularly have reports of burning cities.¹⁸ An interesting exception is in Muršilli II’s account that commemorates the victory of his father Suppiluliuma;

(So) my father went against him.
And the gods ran before my father:
the Sun Goddess of Arinna, the Storm god of Hatti, the Storm god of the Army, and the Lady of the Battlefield.
(Thus) he slew the aforementioned whole tribe, and the enemy troops died in multitudes¹⁹

Finally, and perhaps most significantly, Joshua does not ‘feel’ like any of these ‘conquest accounts’; in Joshua little space is given to describing conquest and warfare per se, the account of Achan (Josh. 7) is unlike anything else one finds in ‘conquest accounts’, as is the altar building of the tribes of the Transjordan (Josh. 22), and the framing of the book (Josh. 1; 23-24) arguably shows more interest in obedience to the law and serving God than in conquest per se, even if it has rhetorical dimensions. Likewise, the distribution of the land (Josh. 13-21), and in particular the establishment of cities of refuge and cities for the Levites (Josh. 20-21) seem to share little with ‘conquest accounts’. In other words, at the level of ‘genre’, Joshua cannot be described as a ‘conquest account’, if indeed such a genre can be identified in the ANE.

5.3 Summary

Whilst Joshua shares a number of motifs from accounts that narrate conquest in the ANE that accentuate its ‘mythical’ character, there are too many important differences to ¹⁴ See ACA, p.217.

¹⁵ ACA, p.223.

¹⁶ ACA, pp.83-84.

¹⁷ ACA, p.224. Cf. Rowlett, Joshua, pp. 90-92.

¹⁸ e.g. KBo III 4 Vs II.1-6, in ACA, p.156.

¹⁹ Frag. 15 F Col. iv-G Col. i.5-10. See H.G. Güterbock, ‘The Deeds of Suppiluliuma as Told by His Son, Muršilli II’, in JCS 10 (1956), pp. 41-130; Rowlett, Joshua, pp. 90-91.

conclude that Joshua's genre is accounted for in these terms, and hence that the nature of such accounts should shape one's understanding of Joshua.²⁰ But awareness of such accounts highlights the stylization of the material in Joshua, in particular of the difficult material in Josh. 10-11, accounts that speak of mass destruction as חרם. To חרם we now turn.

²⁰ Moreover, granted the similarities and differences with a wide range of ANE 'conquest accounts', it seems perilous to use a supposed similarity with, for example, neo-Assyrian accounts to derive a historical context for Joshua.

Chapter 6

Understanding the significance of חָרַם

The significance of the use of the verb חָרַם and the noun חָרָם (as homonym I rather than homonym II ‘net’) is difficult to determine, for their usage intersects with various apparently contradictory categories.¹ The verb is usually understood to refer to destruction in a sacral sense, but as attempts to translate Josh. 6:17 indicate, its sense is problematic.² The root occurs frequently in Deuteronomy and Joshua in relation to the conquest, in I Samuel with regard to Saul, and in the prophetic materials, but is very rare in the remainder of the Old Testament, apart from Lev. 27, being absent from the Psalms. Moreover, accounts in Deuteronomy that use the verb חָרַם have parallels in Exodus and Numbers where the root is not used.³

Whilst one might hope to gather extra-biblical evidence from other ANE texts that would illuminate the use of חָרַם in the Old Testament, the evidence, discussed in detail in

¹ The most comprehensive recent study of חָרַם is Philip Stern’s, perhaps replacing that of C.H.W. Brekelmans as the standard work. (P.D. Stern, The Biblical Herem: A Window on Israel’s Religious Experience (Brown Judaic Studies 211) (Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1991); C.H.W. Brekelmans, De herem in het OT (Nijmegen, 1959). Other treatments include: H.H. Cohn, ‘herem’ in EJ 8, pp.344-356; Y. Hoffman, ‘The Deuteronomistic Concept of the Herem’, in ZAW 111 (1999), pp.196-210; N. Lohfink, ‘ḥāram’ in TDOT V, pp.180-199; R.D. Nelson, ‘Ḥerem and the Deuteronomic Social Conscience’, in J. Lust & M. Vervenne (eds.), Deuteronomy and Deuteronomic Literature: Festschrift C.H.W. Brekelmans (Peeters, 1997), pp.39-54; C. Schäfer-Lichtenberger, ‘Bedeutung und Funktion von Ḥerem in biblisch-hebräischen Texten’, in BZ 38 (1994), pp.270-275. Moreover, there are important discussions in חָרַם in M. Fishbane, Biblical Interpretation in Ancient Israel (Oxford: Clarendon, 1985), pp.200-209; J. Milgrom, Leviticus 23-27 (AB 3B) (New York: Doubleday, 2000), pp.2417-2421 and G.M.H. Ratheiser, Mitzvoth Ethics and the Jewish Bible: The End of Old Testament Theology (London: T&T Clark, 2007), pp.307-315

Stern distinguishes a ‘war-חָרַם’ from a ‘priestly-חָרַם’ (represented in Lev. 27), which he argues is a later re-interpretation of חָרַם in a peaceful cultic setting, but still involving separation, inviolability, holiness and destruction. (Stern, herem, pp.125-126), a distinction that I shall develop. He argues that the earlier war-חָרַם is deeply rooted in mythic conceptions, with the execution of חָרַם interpreted as a participation with YHWH in fighting the forces of chaos to secure order (pp.220-221).

² E.g. ‘devoted for destruction’ (NRSV); ‘devoted’ (NIV); ‘under the ban’ (NAS); ‘set apart’ (NET); ‘devoted under the curse of destruction’ (NJB); ‘doomed to destruction’ (NKJ); ‘completely destroyed as an offering’ (NLT).

³ E.g. Deut. 2:24-3:11 rewrites Num. 21:21-35 using חָרַם.

Stern's study, is surprisingly sparse. The root occurs in the Mesha Inscription (MI), and in the Ugaritic text, 'An Incantation Against Infertility' (KTU 1.13) in verbal form in both cases. These are the only two extant uses of the root ḥrm, or its semantic equivalent, in ANE texts outside the Old Testament in which a sense of annihilation is implied. Thus Joshua does not simply reflect its cultural context, in the same way as it does not reflect ANE 'conquest accounts' as we saw in chapter 5. However, the verb ḥarāmu (II) meaning 'to separate' occurs in Akkadian texts, and is possibly associated with women who are 'socially set apart'.⁴ This usage has not been seen as particularly important for understanding the biblical חָרַם,⁵ although I shall return to this notion of separation later. Other parallels have been sought, such as the assaku in the Mari letters, yet this appears to be a rather partial parallel, and as likely to mislead as to help.⁶ But in the MI and KTU 1.13 the verb ḥrm is associated with destruction. Indeed, in KTU 1.13 ḥrm is used in parallel with hrg, although the text is fragmentary and difficult to interpret.⁷ The MI appears more promising, and here חָרַם is used (line 17) in a way apparently similar to that in Deuteronomy and Joshua, relating to the mass destruction of a group of people (here, Israelites) in battle by divine sanction. However, one may render the verb in a number of ways in the MI, and so perhaps it does not advance one's understanding of biblical חָרַם, although Stern notes that in the biblical narratives and in the MI חָרַם is associated with גֵּרֶשׁ, הִרְג, יָרַשׁ and אָחַז which, he suggests, 'form a small glossary which could be used to describe the struggle for control of land'.⁸

חָרַם occurs in essentially three different contexts in the Old Testament. First, in the deuteronomistic materials the verb is associated with annihilation, with the noun being used to denote that which is to be annihilated. In Deuteronomy חָרַם is used in relation to ⁴ 'ḥarāmu' in CAD vol.6 'ḥ', pp.89-90.

⁵ Stern, herem, p.8.

⁶ See Stern, herem, pp.5-87 for a full discussion of the parallels that have been proposed. It will become clear that trying to read חָרַם in terms of assaku (and vice versa) is indeed misleading, at least for understanding חָרַם in Deuteronomy and Joshua.

⁷ See ibid, pp.5-6 for a discussion of the text.

⁸ Ibid, p.225.

the annihilation of the inhabitants of Canaan during the conquest, but also in relation to Israelite settlements where other gods are worshipped (Deut. 13:13-19 (Heb.)). Secondly, in the prophetic literature the verb is used in an eschatological/apocalyptic sense to describe the fate of the nations, and Babylon in particular, but again, it is also used in relation to Israelites (Isa. 43:28). Thirdly, the root occurs in the priestly materials, usually in the sense of something or someone that is irrevocably dedicated to the YHWH (Lev. 27).

Whilst there has been a tendency to read חרם in these contexts together, there are problems. In Deuteronomy what is declared חרם is to be detested and abhorred (תעב, שקץ, Deut. 7:25-26), yet in Leviticus, and in other priestly material, that which is חרם is associated with that which is holy (קדש), where the noun חרם is associated with land and objects irrevocably handed over to the priests (Lev. 27; Num. 18:14; Ezek. 44:29; Ezra 10:8, and perhaps Josh. 6:19). So comparison of Lev. 27 with Deut. 7, texts which seem to offer paradigmatic accounts of חרם in the priestly and deuteronomistic materials, indicates that there may be a confusion of categories, with the usage of the root being different. However, in Deuteronomy and Joshua, what is חרם is 'ל חרם' (?) 'to' (יהיה) (e.g. Josh. 6:17), resembling the vocabulary associated with offerings. This may connect with the priestly use of the term after all. Moreover, initial readings of Deut. 7, 13 and Josh. 7 give the impression that חרם objects may be viewed as a 'contagion', which has clear resonances with priestly categories, although the objects that are declared חרם varies in the deuteronomistic literature (Josh. 6 cf. Josh. 8).

So, leaving aside the prophetic literature, three questions arise from reading Deut. 7 & 13, Josh. 6-7 and Lev. 27 in their literary contexts. First, comparing Josh. 6:19 & 24 with Deut. 7:25-26, how can that which is categorized as קדש in Josh. 6:19 & 24 also be categorized as תעב and שקץ in Deut. 7:25-26? Secondly, does the grammar of חרם as לִיהוָה חֶרֶם in Josh. 6:17 support a ‘sacrificial’ understanding of חֶרֶם in the deuteronomistic materials? Thirdly, do Deut. 7, 13 and Josh. 6-7 imply that חֶרֶם objects are viewed as a contagion?

6.1 Re-examining the ‘priestly-like’ approaches to חֶרֶם in the non-priestly literature

חֶרֶם and the categories of קֶדֶשׁ, תַּעֲבָ and שִׁקֵּץ

In Josh. 6:17 Joshua orders that Jericho and everything in it ‘are to be חֶרֶם’. The execution of this command is reported in 6:21 & 24 where it appears that total destruction is envisaged. However, 6:19 & 24 report that precious metallic objects are קֶדֶשׁ to the YHWH and are to go into the treasury. This report can be understood in three different ways. First, perhaps the metallic objects were implicitly understood as not being חֶרֶם. Secondly, perhaps the conception of חֶרֶם found in the priestly materials exists here, and is in fact associated with the deuteronomistic conception. Thirdly, whilst the priestly conception is in view here, such a conception may be distinct from the deuteronomistic conception, with these verses representing a priestly (or priestly influenced) gloss.

In the context of Josh. 7 it seems that the metals were categorised as חֶרֶם (7:1, 21), as Deut. 7:25-26 would suggest, where the language of coveting in both accounts invites them to be read together. But Deut. 7 implies that all objects designated as חֶרֶם, including the metals from which they were made, should have been destroyed, as would Josh. 7:12. Indeed, Josh. 7 does not suggest that the required corrective action arising from Achan’s crime is to return the items that he took to the treasury, but to destroy them. Moreover, objects that are חֶרֶם are to be detested and abhorred (שִׁקֵּץ, תַּעֲבָ, Deut. 7:25-26). This sits uneasily with categorization of the חֶרֶם metals as קֶדֶשׁ in Josh. 6:19 & 24; would one place that which is to be detested and abhorred into the Lord's treasury and call it holy?⁹

So, coupled with the observation that the clauses relating to the metals in Josh. 6:19 & 24 can be removed from the story without loss to its flow, good grounds exist to suppose that Josh. 6:19 & 24 are later priestly (or priestly influenced) additions.¹⁰ Indeed, this trajectory of reading a priestly conception of חרם into the account is further developed in 4Q379 3 II, 5-6, which is a re-working of Josh. 6-7, where allusion to Lev. 27:28-29 is explicit.¹¹

Thus it is preferable to differentiate distinct uses of חרם that we might call a deuteronomistic sense, associated with תעב and שקץ, and a priestly sense associated with קדש, even if they both involve separation. However, there are grounds for construing חרם, in its deuteronomistic sense, as being an 'offering' (Deut. 13:16-17 (Heb); Josh. 6:17), to which we now turn.

חרם and the language of 'offering' to YHWH

The grammar of חרם as being ליהוה is found only in Josh. 6:17 in the deuteronomistic materials, and only Mic. 4:13 and Lev. 27 elsewhere, although the language of Deut. 13:16-17 (Heb) is taken to reinforce this conception of חרם as 'sacrificial offering'. When compared with the usage of זבח it is suggestive of interpreting חרם using the category of 'offering'. Indeed, Kaminsky suggests that when one treats something as חֹרֵם, it means that the object is consecrated or dedicated in an almost sacrificial manner. Support for such an understanding of the חֹרֵם can be found in several biblical passages. Notice the way in which Deut. 13:17 uses terminology that is strongly reminiscent of the language surrounding the idea of sacrifice ... Sacrificial terminology can also be found in Josh. 6:17a ... and in Lev. 27:28b.¹²

⁹ Cf. Schäfer-Lichtenberger, 'Bedeutung und Funktion'; 'Qdš und ḥrm symbolisieren hier zwei verschiedene Sphären, die strikt voneinander geschieden sind. Ḥerem ist die Gegensphäre zum Heiligen.' (p.274).

¹⁰ Cf. J.S. Kaminsky ('Joshua 7: A Reassessment of the Israelite Conceptions of Corporate Punishment', in S.W. Holloway & L.K. Handy (eds.), The Pitcher is Broken: Memorial Essays for Gösta W. Ahlström (JSOTSup 190) (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1995), pp.315-346, here pp.329-330).

¹¹ H.D. Park, Finding Herem? A Study of Luke-Acts in the Light of Ḥerem (Library of New Testament Studies 357) (London: T&T Clark, 2007), p.84.

In Josh. 6:17 Jericho is to be לִיהוּהָ חֹרֵם, and in Mic. 4:13 it is the unjust gains of the nations that הַחֲרָמֹתֵי לִיהוּהָ. But what does לִיהוּהָ mean in these contexts? Deut. 13:16-17 (Heb) is an important text. It commands the חֹרֵם of an Israelite town where people have been led astray to worship other gods, stating that everything in the town is to be gathered in the square and burnt לִיהוּהָ כָּלִיל. Here, כָּלִיל is usually taken to mean ‘whole burnt offering’ (cf. Deut. 33:10), which would obviously associate חֹרֵם with the idea of ‘offering’, clarifying the sense לִיהוּהָ. But it is equally possible to read כָּלִיל adverbially, for emphasis, i.e., reading ‘the city and all its plunder in its entirety’, which would reflect the more common usage of כָּלִיל.¹³ Significantly, when used in Leviticus כָּלִיל is only used in the sense of completeness, suggesting that it is not part of the vocabulary of offerings. Moreover, dis-associating חֹרֵם from the category of offering is supported by the use of the categories relating to ‘detesting’ (שִׂקִּץ, תֵּעֵב) in relation to חֹרֵם (Deut. 7:25-26);¹⁴ would one offer something detestable to YHWH?

How then does the lamed function in לִיהוּהָ? Does it connote ‘to YHWH’, and if so then what does this mean? Or ‘for YHWH’, or ‘on behalf of YHWH’, maybe to emphasise agency; i.e. that חרם is conducted on YHWH's behalf as the result of a divine command?¹⁵ Whatever the precise sense, ליהוה need not connote an idea of offering or sacrifice; its usage is far wider.¹⁶ However, evidence from the Mesha Inscription might question this argument. In the MI it is possible that חרם (line 17) may be associated, via parallelism, with what is described earlier as a רית (satiation?) to the god Kemosh (line 12) which might suggest that חרם in its ANE context is associated with the idea of offerings.¹⁷ However רית is used in conjunction with הרג (line 11) and not חרם, and if רית derives from רוה it may have a less 'technical' and more metaphorical sense. Indeed רוה is associated with חרם in Isa. 34:5, and has a metaphorical sense.¹⁸ Moreover, הרג occurs 172x in the Old Testament but never in conjunction with ליהוה, suggesting that the usage of the roots in the MI do not map directly onto those in the Old Testament.

¹² Kaminsky, ‘Joshua’, p.331.

¹³ It occurs in Ex.28:31; 39:22; Lev. 6:15, 16; Num. 4:6; Judg. 20:40; Isa. 2:18; Lam. 2:15; Ezek. 16:14; 27:3; 28:12 in the sense of completeness, and Deut. 33:10; 1 Sam. 7:9 and Ps. 51:21; in the sense of offering. Cf. Lohfink, ‘ḥāram’, p.184 who questions whether כָּלִיל ‘was perceived as a sacrificial term’ here.

¹⁴ See also Nelson, ‘Herem’, who argues that חֹרֵם is not to be understood in sacrificial terms (p.47). But later I shall argue that it is not a property of חֹרֵם-ness per se that makes an object detestable; rather it is its association with idolatry. But here my argument is simply that it is unlikely that a detestable object would be considered an acceptable offering.

Hence the association of חרם with the category of 'offering' in the deuteronomistic materials is problematic, although the grammar of its usage might be suggestive of accounting for how the priestly conception of חרם may have emerged, perhaps through texts like Mic. 4:13.¹⁹ But the root חרם may have suited the purpose of the Deuteronomist because it was a rare term associated with separation, annihilation and the divine sphere, thus being exceptional; understanding חרם as being ליהוה grants the term a narrower and more precise sense than terms such as שמד and הרג which are never used in conjunction with ליהוה, which thus suggests that חרם has a mythical association relating in a rather ambiguous way to the divine sphere in a way that other ¹⁵ See B.K. Waltke & M. O'Connor, An Introduction to Biblical Hebrew Syntax (Winona Lake: Eisenbrauns, 1990), pp.205-212 for discussion of the wide range of uses of the preposition.

¹⁶ Cf. e.g. Gen. 24:26; Deut. 1:41; 16:1; 1 Sam. 1:3; 2:8; 3:20; 2 Sam. 21:6; 1 Kg. 6:1-2; 19:10 & 2 Kg. 6:33 for a variety of senses for ליהוה.

¹⁷ רית (line 12) is usually rendered 'satiation' from רוה, although it is, as Stern notes, something of an interpretative crux (herem, p.32). Cf. also K.A.D. Smelik, 'Moabite Inscriptions' in CoS II, pp.137-138

¹⁸ See also Nelson, 'Herem', pp.47-48.

¹⁹ Supposing, that is, the priestly conception to be later; see below.

terms relating to destruction do not.²⁰ Perhaps ‘for YHWH’ is the best rendering of ליהוה.

חרם, contagiousness and impurity

It has become popular to regard חרם objects as a ‘contagion’.²¹ This appears to stem from Josh. 6:18; 7:10-15; Deut. 7:25-26 and perhaps Deut. 13:12-18 (Heb). For example, Kaminsky suggests that ‘The sacral character of חרם also extends to the effect it has on those who misuse it. It is clear from Deut. 7:25-26 ... and from Josh. 6:18 ... that when one misappropriates חרם, one runs the risk of having the tabooed status of the חרם transferred to oneself.’²² He elaborates on this in a footnote,

‘this is wholly analogous to the contagiousness of the state of impurity, and a provision of the law of impurity is really the best commentary on the story of Achan’s crime ... (Num. 19:14)’ ... [I]t is important to recognize that חרם can spread and thus can be described as something that is contagious.²³ and develops it further in his reading of Josh. 7:

חרם is sacral in nature and has the ability to transmit its taboo status to those who misappropriate it. That this factor is operational in this narrative is stated rather explicitly in Josh. 7:12 ... This verse appears to indicate that all Israel has, at least temporarily, become חרם. Verse 15, in which God orders that Achan and everything he owns be burned, suggests that the tabooed status of misappropriated objects spreads to Achan’s family and possessions.²⁴

However, I shall argue that it is a mistake to regard חרם objects as a contagion, and hence argue that it should not be interpreted via this or similar priestly-like categories. I shall demonstrate that, first, חרם is not associated with the use of the vocabulary of priestly categories relating to contagion or impurity; secondly, חרם is not associated with any conceptually equivalent deuteronomistic categories, and thirdly, in the texts that ²⁰ Cf. Stern, herem, pp.220-224.

²¹ See e.g. L.D. Hawk, Joshua (Berit Olam) (Collegeville: The Liturgical Press, 2000), p.100; R.D. Nelson, Joshua (OTL) (Louisville: Westminster John Knox Press, 1997), p.101; J.F.D. Creach, Joshua (Interpretation) (Louisville: John Knox Press, 2003), pp.72-74; Kaminsky, ‘Joshua’, pp.331ff; Lohfink, ‘hāram’, p.194.

²² Kaminsky, ‘Joshua’, p.331.

²³ Ibid, pp.331-332.

²⁴ Ibid, pp.336-337.

might appear to support understanding חרם in terms of contagion, a rhetorical understanding of the texts offers a better construal of חרם, being construed 'rhetorically' rather than 'ontologically'.

First, חרם is never associated with the vocabulary of 'spreading' as per other Levitical notions of impurity or uncleanness, or indeed of 'spreading' generally; חרם is never used in conjunction with פרש or פשה, which it might be if it were understood using the priestly categories of 'contagion' or 'contamination' (cf. Lev. 13-14). Furthermore, the language for 'unclean-ness' and 'clean-ness' or purity does not fit; neither טמא nor טהר are ever used in conjunction with חרם. Moreover, the language of 'transmission' for טמא uses the verb נגע (touch), a verb not used in conjunction with חרם. What is more, such unclean-ness is temporary and can be removed by appropriate procedures, which is not, it seems, the case with חרם.²⁵ Finally, the lack of priestly terminology, especially in Josh. 7, is striking considering the use of מועל, a priestly term, in Josh. 7. Taken together, these observations suggest that it is a category mistake to interpret חרם via categories such as purity/impurity and/or contagion, for חרם is not 'talked about' in this grammar.²⁶

Secondly, the phrase ידבק בידך 'cling to the hand' used in relation to חרם in Deut. 13:18 (Heb) might be said to express an idea of 'contagion' in a different idiom; in Deut. 13:12-17 an Israelite town is to be subject to חרם if people have been led to worship other gods, with an additional note in 13:18 stating that חרם objects must not to ‘cling to the hand’ (ולא־יִדְבֹק בִּידְךָ מֵאוֹמָה מִן־הַחֲרָם). רִבֵּק occurs 7x elsewhere in Deuteronomy, 5x to describe ‘holding fast’ to YHWH (Deut. 4:4; 10:20; 11:22; 13:5; 30:20) and twice with references to diseases ‘clinging’ to one (Deut. 28:21, 60). It occurs 3x in Joshua, twice with reference to clinging to YHWH (Josh. 22:5; 23:8) and once with reference to clinging to the survivors in the land, as a warning against doing so (Josh. 23:12). Thus it seems that more than simply coming into contact is implied by the idiom; rather, it implies an ‘attachment’ to the object(s) in question, suggesting that ‘contagion’ may be an inappropriate description.

²⁵ Cf. Lev. 11:24-28 in relation to touching the carcasses of unclean animals, and Lev. 12:4 where uncleanness, cleanness (טהרה) and touching (נגע) holy things (קדש) are established in a matrix, a matrix from which חרם is absent, except in Lev. 27 where חרם is associated only with קדש, which I suggest represents a development of חרם in a different context.

²⁶ Moreover, the term 'contagion' was made popular in relation to the purity laws of Leviticus by Mary Douglas (Purity and Danger (London: Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1966)), but I am not aware of her ever using 'contagion' in relation to חרם.

However, the language of ‘bringing into the house’ of objects associated with idols in Deut. 7:25-26 might be said to resonate with that of the unclean-ness that results from diseases in the house which cause all who enter the house to be unclean (Lev. 14:46-47). But, as with Deut. 13:12-18, in the context of 7:25, it seems that more than literally ‘entering the house’ is envisaged; the idea of coveting is introduced in Deut. 7:25, being similar to that of ‘attachment’ in Deut. 13:18.

Thirdly, the ‘threats’ relating to חרם – that you may end up as subject to חרם if you ‘involve yourself’ with חרם objects inappropriately - have a rhetorical force, relating to the avoidance of idols, and of coveting, rather than an ontological force; these texts do not describe the process by which חרם is ‘transmitted’. Indeed, in Deut. 7,13 and 20, what is to be detested is not חרם objects per se as if they have some ontological property of ‘herem-ness’, rather it is idols, the practices of idolatry and the worship of other gods that are to be detested. Deut. 20:17-18 indicates that the concern for ‘spreading’ is not for the spreading of חרם, but of the teaching that encourages the worship of other gods. Thus these texts reflect warnings against idolatry and covetousness, rather than explanations of a transmission process of a supposed חרם property. To use the language of myth developed in chapter 2, these texts represent ‘limit-situations’ that function to shape what it is that is to characterize the identity of Israel, rather than actual practice. The continual struggle against idolatry and the worship of other gods in the ‘biblical history’ of Israel suggests that if Deut. 13:12-18 (Heb) had been practised to the letter, little would have remained of Israel! Indeed, the Temple Scroll (11Q19, LV, 6-12) which re-writes Deut. 13:16-18 to require the whole city to have fallen into idolatry, indicates that a problem was perceived with the literal application of Deut. 13,²⁷ and is a tradition associated with the text that clarifies its use, indicating that it does function as a ‘limit-situation’. These injunctions seek to inculcate an attitude of careful avoidance of idols and other gods. So Deuteronomy itself may be construed as a mythical narrative that shapes the life and identity of Israel in some of the ways outlined in chapter 2; it is not a ‘legal code’ in the modern sense.²⁸

Finally, Josh. 7 is best construed via the ‘rhetoric of חֵרֶם’; for another difficulty that Kaminsky’s analysis raises is that if, as he suggests, Israel has become ‘temporarily’ חֵרֶם in Josh. 7:12,²⁹ then this sits uncomfortably with the assumption that declaring something חֵרֶם is an irrevocable declaration relating to the ontological state of an object, an assumption probably made via the influence of priestly conceptions of חֵרֶם.³⁰ The solution is to read Josh. 7:12-13 ‘rhetorically’ rather than ‘ontologically’; Josh. 7:12-13, together with Josh. 6:18 form warnings embedded in rhetorical contexts. Whilst one might claim that the ‘interpretative keys’ of 7:1 & 11 suggest that חֵרֶם objects are a contagion, Josh. 7:11, reporting YHWH’s response to Joshua, can be understood in two ways. It could be understood to imply that the problem here is the contagiousness of the חֵרֶם per se, or that the issue is really that violation of the חֵרֶם represents disobedience, and in fact symbolises covenant violation. The importance of the latter is indicated in ²⁷ Cf. Park, Herem, pp.68-71.

²⁸ This assertion does, of course, need further development, but cf. N.M. Sarna, Exploring Exodus: The Origins of Biblical Israel (New York: Schocken Books, 1996), pp.168-170 on the way that law codes functioned in the ANE.

²⁹ Kaminsky, Joshua, pp.336-337.

³⁰ Cf. Nelson, ‘Herem’, pp.44-45; Hawk, Joshua, pp.100-101. What is often evident in the discussions is a conflation of the concept of חֵרֶם in Lev. 27 with that in Deuteronomy, Joshua, and other ANE texts.

7:11 and in 7:21 where Achan confesses, for the use of גָּנַב (steal) in 7:11 reflects the Decalogue's language (Deut. 5:19), as does חָמַד (covet) in 7:21.³¹ Indeed, if one reads on into Josh. 8 (8:2), what is declared חָרָם varies (cf. 6:17-18 & Deut. 7:25-26), which again suggests that an ontological sort of conception of חָרָם or 'contamination' is not the primary issue.

Thus covenant violation is really the issue,³² which the חָרָם violation symbolises. The presence of חָרָם objects is not a problem because they contaminate the Israelite camp with a property of 'חָרָם-ness', but because their presence is symbolic of covenant violation. Covenant violation cannot be 'present' in Israel. Obedience can only be restored when the חָרָם objects are destroyed, as per YHWH's original injunction.³³ Thus it is not so much חָרָם objects that have a 'sacral character', but the covenant, that is here symbolized by חָרָם. The concern of the story is that of identity construction with respect to the covenant; the covenant, and obedience to it, is central to the characterization of Israel's identity. To use the language developed in chapter 2, and to anticipate the more detailed analysis of Josh. 7 in chapter 8, Josh. 7 presents, as myth, a story as a 'limit-situation' that disobedience to the covenant makes one an outsider, symbolized by death of the offender and their family.

Summary

There has been a tendency to read conceptions of the priestly חָרָם into the deuteronomistic accounts of חָרָם which has led to a skewed and incorrect understanding of the narratives dealing with it. But we have seen how the grammar associated with חרם is suggestive of its development in the Priestly sense.³⁴ Historically speaking such a development is plausible granted that in Leviticus for example the priestly-חרם only occurs in Lev. 27, which is perhaps the paradigmatic text dealing with the priestly-חרם, a text that is widely acknowledged to be a late addition to Leviticus (see below). Furthermore, the only two extant occurrences of the root חרם in other ANE texts are in the relatively early Mesha Inscription and the Ugaritic 'Incantation against infertility' (KTU 1.13) where it occurs in verbal form and is used in a way similar to that in Deuteronomy and Joshua. Thus it is plausible that the deuteronomistic conception of חרם reflects an early appropriation of this rare Western Semitic term, whilst its priestly conception reflects an exilic (or later) development of the deuteronomistic conception, however one wishes to date the core of the priestly and deuteronomistic materials.³⁵ ³⁵ Lev. 27:21ff is the main text dealing with the 'priestly-חרם'. Gerstenberger suggests that Lev. 26 was probably the original conclusion of Leviticus, as it was common for ANE legal collections, etc. to conclude with such imprecatory formulae as we find here (E.S. Gerstenberger, Leviticus (Louisville: WJKP, ET:1996), p.399). Moreover, he claims that Lev. 27 differs in 'form and content' from the rest of the book, forming a 'kind of price list for redeeming persons and objects promised to God through a vow' (Ibid., p.436; Cf. M. Noth, Leviticus (OTL) (London: SCM, Rev. ET: 1977), p.203). Importantly, there is general agreement that Lev. 27 is an 'appendix' added at a relatively late stage to Leviticus. Indeed, Jacob Milgrom who argues (convincingly, I think) for a rather earlier date for P (and H) than most argues that the logical closure of H (the later material, parts of which are 'demonstrably exilic', he claims) is Lev. 26 (Milgrom, Leviticus 23-27, pp.2407-2409. (See also his 'Priestly ("P") Source' in ABD, vol.5, pp.454-461). However, he notes that the valuation of fifty shekels for an adult male (27:3) suggests a pre-exilic date for some of the materials of Lev.27 (Ibid., p.2409), and thus it is difficult to know where to situate the חרם materials of Lev.27, even if they were only incorporated into the book at a late stage. They are probably late, but could be seventh or eighth century (cf. 27:3). What does a wider analysis of the priestly materials suggest?

³¹ Moreover, the use of כָּחַשׁ (deceive) in 7:11 may amplify the issue at stake. However, כָּחַשׁ and the context of stealing seems to reflect Lev. 5:21ff (Heb), a resonance strengthened via the use of מָעַל here and in Josh. 7:1. The use of מָעַל is all the more significant in Josh. 7:1 as it is so rare in the deuteronomistic literature (only Deut. 32:51; Josh. 7:1; 22:16, 20, 31), but common in, e.g. P and Chr. However, the resolution of the offence is very different in Leviticus from that in Joshua.

³² Cf. R.S. Hess, Joshua (TOTC) (Leicester: IVP, 1996), pp.149-150.

³³ The observation that the silver and gold are to be destroyed here, rather than put into the treasury is a further indicator that Josh. 6:19 & 24 are later glosses.

³⁴ See Lohfink's discussion of Brekelmans' study in TDOT, esp. pp.185ff for an account that would suggest an alternative reconstruction of the development of the term, treating the more 'priestly' conception as primary, a view that seems to have been followed often. My analysis, rather like Stern's, seems to point in the opposite direction.

Apart from Lev. 27 there are no references to the root חרם at all in Leviticus, except a homonym in Lev. 21:18. But if the חרם concept in Lev. 27 were early, it is surprising that it is not referred to in the 'earlier redaction' of Leviticus. This adds weight to the suggestion that the חרם in Lev. 27 is a relatively late development in P and/or H. Moreover, the only references in the Old Testament to the root חרם in the sort of way that it is used in Lev. 27:21-29, i.e. its association with the priests, the treasury and the category שְׁקָל are Num. 18:14; Ezra 10:8; Ezek. 44:29 (cf. Num.18:14) and possibly Josh. 6:19 & 24. Clearly Ezra 10:8 is late. Ezek. 44:29 is exilic or later, and Num. 18:14 is very similar to Ezek. 44:29, and Budd suggests that in Num. 18:14 the author uses ḥērem as an alternative to the terumah contribution' (P.J. Budd, Numbers (WBC 5) (Dallas: Word, 1984), p.206), and that Num. 18:14 is dependent upon Ezek. 44:29,

6.2 A mythical approach to the deuteronomistic חרם

Having argued what חרם is not, we must now consider what it is. An initial reading of the deuteronomistic materials gives the impression that חרם as a verb is a term used as a divine command that connotes annihilation, either of people or of objects. I shall argue that a mythical reading of the texts is appropriate and indicates that חרם functions as a symbol. As a symbol חרם takes the image of annihilation as its first-order, literal or concrete sense, a sense that is 'literal' within the 'world of the text', but is to be appropriated or enacted existentially in another way, through the symbol's 'second-order' sense, a sense that I shall now develop. First, I shall consider temporal perspectives on חרם to assist in establishing its symbolic and mythical character, before considering, secondly, what its significance is by studying the way in which its second-order sense was construed and developed within Israel according to the witness of various biblical texts, i.e., how it was used.

Temporal perspectives and the mythical nature of חרם

Outside Deuteronomy and Joshua, references to 'deuteronomistic-חרם' are rare. In Judges, Samuel-Kings and Chronicles it occurs in relation to activities that trace back to the conquest in some sense (Judg. 1:17; 1 Kg. 9:21 and 1 Chr. 4:41). It also describes the actions of others (2 Kg. 19:11 (&/s 2 Chr. 32:14; Isa. 37:11)), where the verb is attributed to Sennacherib, an interesting observation given that the root חרם, or equivalent, does not appear in any Akkadian texts, and likewise in 2 Chr. 20:23 חרם is used in relation to the action of the Ammonites and Moabites against the men of Mount Seir. In 1 Kg. 20:42 it is used in relation to a man (Ben Hadad) whom a prophet said placing it in a late fifth century context where it was necessary to reform the 'clerical office' (pp.202, 206-207). Such a historical reconstruction, although plausible, is difficult to substantiate. But, if Num. 18:14 were early, it would be exceptional, with Lev. 27 being the only other candidate for an early usage of a priestly-חרם. Thus it seems most likely that the priestly-חרם is indeed a late concept, with Josh. 6:19 & 24 reflecting it as later glosses to a stable text.

should die, but whom Ahab allowed to live. It is an unusual text, and Stern regards it as an attempt to produce a parallel with Saul, noting, moreover, a possible association, or wordplay with חרם II 'net'.³⁶ Its usage in Judg. 21:11 is unusual, and difficult to explain; Stern merely suggests that it is 'isolated'.³⁷ Finally, it occurs in 1 Sam. 15, a text that I wish to leave to one side for the moment, but will return to in chapter 9, as its significance here is best explained after considering the role of חרם in Joshua. Thus the virtual absence of חרם from Judges, Samuel-Kings and Chronicles is striking, suggesting that it is not part of Israel's vocabulary of warfare, or indeed of any concept like 'Holy War' per se.³⁸ Similarly, the absence of חרם from the Psalms is surely significant, particularly in contexts where it might have been expected, such as Ps. 135, 136 and 137. If, in some sense, the Psalms reflect Israel's regular grammar of contemporary response to YHWH, then it is striking that חרם is absent. Leaving Deuteronomy and Joshua aside for a moment, taken together, these observations suggest that deuteronomistic-חרם is not a category that Israel uses to describe her existence or narrate her actions in the present, suggesting that חרם is 'displaced' from the present.

However, חרם is developed and used in an other-worldly eschatological direction in the prophetic materials.³⁹ Its use here is varied, but when associated with YHWH and/or ³⁶ Stern, herem, pp.178-183.

³⁷ Ibid, pp.160-163.

³⁸ For this reason, and, since as will become clear, I do not think that Joshua is really about warfare, I shall not discuss 'holy war' and the debates surrounding it (See G. von Rad, Holy War in Ancient Israel (Grand Rapids: W.B. Eerdmans, ET:1991); S. Niditch, War in the Hebrew Bible (Oxford: OUP, 1993)). It will be clear that I do not follow von Rad or Niditch. Peter Craigie's comments on von Rad are apt; 'While war was religious by association, it was no more a cultic and holy act than was sheep shearing.' (The Problem of War in the Old Testament (Grand Rapids: W.B. Eerdmans, 1978), p.49). See Ratheiser, Mitzvoth Ethics, pp.307-310 for a recent summary of research on the concept of 'holy war'. One of the main difficulties has been, I think, a tendency to conflate the priestly and deuteronomistic conceptions of חרם. However, whilst 'holy war' might be an unhelpful category, it is clear that Israel (and Judah) fought wars like everybody else (and emerged as a nation through warfare), and that from other texts from the ANE that it was common to presume that deities were involved in human warfare. I do not think that Joshua tells us much about, or is really concerned with warfare in Israel, however, as will become clear.

³⁹ In the prophets the verb חרם is used in an eschatological or future sense in Isa. 34:2, 5; 43:28; Jer. 25:9; 50:21, 26; 51:3; Dan. 11:44; Mic. 4:13 and Zech. 14:11, where it is used as part of the language of poetic prophetic oracles that are replete with metaphor. (It also occurs in the MT of Isa. 11:15, but this appears to Israel, חרם is either a judgment that will fall upon Israel/Judah in the near future, or it is an expression of YHWH's (eschatological) wrath against the nations. But it is a concept of the future, which, mythologically speaking, provides the contours for an existential response in the 'here and now'; do not go after the nations and their ways, and do not worry about them, for they are doomed, as will you be if you keep following their gods. But whilst Israel was prophetically threatened with חרם unless she changed her ways (Isa. 43:28; Jer. 25:9; Zech. 14:11), when such punishment occurred it was not interpreted using the category of חרם. So here, it is pushed into the future as a rhetorical anticipatory category, again displacing it from the present even if it has significance in the present in an existential sense.

Apart from Joshua and Deuteronomy, there are no other instances of 'deuteronomistic-חרם' in the Old Testament. Now, Joshua places the portrayal of a 'literal חרם' in the prototypical past. This sense of the prototypical past is reinforced through references to the Anakim and Rephaim, mythical giants and ghosts from the distant past that dwelt in the world of Joshua's חרם, a world that is very different from the Israelites' everyday be a textual corruption – see Stern, herem, p.192.) It also appears in Isa. 37:11 in a non-priestly, non-futuristic sense. Now:

1. In Isa. 37:11 (/2Kg. 19:11) חרם is the verb that Sennacherib is reported to use in relation to what he has done to other nations. It is clearly referring to destruction, and Hezekiah's prayer in response suggests an association with the destruction of gods and idols (37:18-19);
2. In Isa. 34:2, 5; Jer. 50:21, 26; 51:3 חרם is used as a verb in an eschatological/apocalyptic context to describe what YHWH will do to the nations (Isaiah) or Babylon (Jeremiah). Jeremiah makes more explicit the association between sins and חרם, but again, חרם clearly refers to destruction;
3. In Isa. 43:28; Jer. 25:9; Zech. 14:11 it is Jacob, Judah or Jerusalem that is the object of the verb חרם. In Isaiah and Jeremiah it is used in the context of a vision of the imminent future where it is understood as YHWH's punishment and functions as a warning. In Zechariah it is in an eschatological context, where Jerusalem will suffer חרם no more;
4. In Dan. 11:44 חרם appears in an apocalyptic context, but it is one of the kings in Daniel's vision that is the subject of the verb, and it is simply 'many people' that is the object, and is a result of this king's great rage; experienced world. Indeed, the conclusion of the conquest in Josh. 11 is described in terms of the destruction of these ‘mythical beings’,⁴⁰ with the result that Israel settles in the land and enjoys rest from warfare (Josh. 11:21-23), encouraging the reader to associate the world of a practice of ‘literal חֶרֶם’ with an other-worldly prototypical past.
5. In Mic. 4:13 חרם appears in an apocalyptic/eschatological vision, but it is the 'unjust gains' of the nations that are the object of the verb חרם, and are said to be חרם 'to YHWH'. The usage here is thus slightly ambiguous, occupying a position that resonates both with the 'war-חרם' and the 'priestly-חרם'.

Moreover, as it appears that the Deuteronomy re-tells other traditions by using חֶרֶם as a retrospective interpretative category (Deut. 2-3, cf. Num. 21:21ff; Deut. 7, cf. Ex. 23:20-33; 34:10-14 & Num. 33:50-56) it seems that if there ever was a conquest, it is very unlikely that it was interpreted using the category of חֶרֶם at the time.⁴¹ In other words, here חֶרֶם has ‘literary’ rather than ‘literal’ existence being a retrojection into the past in the ‘world of a text’, with the commands of Deut. 7:1-26 (cf. 20:16-18) being a later retrojection that is ‘fulfilled’ in Joshua, in the prototypical past. Indeed, Josh. 23-24, which draw, in some sense, the ongoing charge to Israel into the world of the reader do not mention חֶרֶם or the destruction of the property of others – only of one’s own idols, although separation from ‘the locals’ is commanded. The only remaining text in Deuteronomy that mentions חֶרֶם not in the context of the prototypical time of the conquest is Deut. 13:12-18 (Heb), a text that we have already considered as a ‘limit-situation’ that rhetorically exhorts the avoidance of idolatry, and is a text in which חֶרֶם is self-directed against Israel.

In summary, literal חֶרֶם only exists in the world of the text; it is ‘never now’, even if the symbol has a second-order sense that relates to life ‘here and now’ in a sense that I shall now develop, relating to the avoidance of idolatry and the worship of other gods in Deuteronomy. Crucially though, I shall argue later in chapter 9 that it has a rather different significance in Joshua.

⁴⁰ Num. 13:1-33; Deut. 2:11; 3:11; 9:1-3; Josh. 11:21-23. I use ‘mythical’ here in the more traditional sense of the word. See chapter 8.

⁴¹ I.e. taking Joshua and Deuteronomy to have been written long after any such conquest if indeed there was one as such. Moreover, whilst חֶרֶם occurs in Ex. 22:19 its use here is often regarded as a textual corruption for אֲחֵרִים (J.I. Durham, Exodus (WBC 3) (Dallas: Word, 1987), p.327).

The continual significance and appropriation of חרם – its second-order sense in Deuteronomy

The 'literal' practice of חרם only exists in the 'world of the text', and then in the distant past or in the distant future, and 'never now'. But turning now to Josh. 23-24, Josh. 23 & 24 construe Israel's ongoing task as being careful to obey the law (23:6); not to associate with the nations who remain in the land (23:7); not to serve other gods (23:7); to love YHWH (23:11), and not to intermarry (23:12). If Israel obeys this charge, then YHWH will continue to drive the other nations out (23:13). What is noteworthy is that there is no call for Israel to engage in fighting of any kind, nor indeed to destroy the idols and altars of the surviving nations. There is only a call for Israel to throw away her own idols (24:14, 23). The only remaining injunction from Deut. 7 with regard to the surviving nations is the command not to intermarry. Thus it would appear that the way in which the חרם injunctions in Deuteronomy are to find existential significance and be enacted according to Josh. 23-24, and thus the task of Deut. 7 completed,⁴² is via separation, negatively, and obedience to the law, positively.

Josh. 23-24, however it relates diachronically in compositional terms to the remainder of Joshua, can be regarded as a theological commentary on Joshua and the 'deuteronomistic-חרם'. But is it a faithful commentary and testimony to חרם? It is not the only material that provides clues to the significance of the 'deuteronomistic-חרם'. I would like to consider the use of the terms בָּדַל (separation) and קִיא (vomit) in the priestly materials. בָּדַל is used in the sense of the setting apart of Israel from the nations, and for distinguishing clean from unclean in Lev. 20:22-26, where קִיא (vomiting) is the term used for the expulsion of people from the land who defile it, be that Israelites or others (Lev. 18:25, 28; 20:22) who are 'sent out' by YHWH (שָׁלַח, Lev. 20:23) in order to allow Israel to possess (שׁיר, 20:24) the land. This is summarised in Lev. 20:26 – ‘You shall be holy to me; for I the LORD am holy, and I have separated (ברל) you from the other peoples to be mine.’ (NRSV)

⁴² Since Josh. 23-24 imply that the task is incomplete.

Comparing Lev. 20 with Deut. 7, where the possession of the land is achieved via חרם, it appears that the Deuteronomist and the priestly writer draw upon different symbols to portray the ‘clearing of space’ in the land for Israel, and her ‘separation’ from others and their evil practices.⁴³ The priestly writer uses the symbol of vomiting to portray a somewhat inexplicable disappearance of ‘outsiders’, whilst the Deuteronomist uses a symbol relating to annihilation that perhaps offers a more ‘realistic’ account of the disappearance of outsiders. Moreover, the Deuteronomist uses the single symbol of חרם whilst the priestly writer uses the symbol קיא along with the category ברל. Both symbols (חרם and קיא) interpret Israel’s possession of land, but each symbol evokes a different affectual aspect – a feeling of sickness toward the detestable practices of the locals and their effects for the priestly writer, and a sense of conflict, annihilation, and a call to action for the Deuteronomist. In other words the priestly writer affectually describes the effect of evil and those who practice it (picture vomit),⁴⁴ whereas the Deuteronomist affectually describes how the removal of evil is to be effected (picture radical annihilation). So, for P the affectual concern is to make you feel sick about idolatry, whilst for D it is to make you want to wipe it out with it being a struggle to do so, with this struggle being construed using concepts relating to violence and destruction. Moreover, the use of קיא in relation to both Israelite and outsider who practice evil in Leviticus is mirrored by the use of חרם in relation to the annihilation of idolatry both in outsiders (Deut. 7) and in Israelites (Deut. 13) – in other words קיא maps onto חרם.

⁴³ Likewise Ex. 23:20-33 offers another perspective – the locals will simply כחך (hiphil) – vanish?

⁴⁴ Indeed, the other non-deuteronomistic traditions (Ex.15:15; 23:20-33 (attributed to J and E respectively by Driver (Exodus, p.xxvi-xxvii))) seem to have had rather less interest in how Israel was to come into possession of the land, only what was to happen when she did.

However, the second-order sense of both symbols (קיא and חרם) is בדרל (separation), as demonstrated in Ezra; it seems that both symbols had become problematic or tired, and that it is the second-order sense of the symbols (בדרל) that is made explicit here, where Ezra draws upon the ideas of Lev. 20 and Deut. 7. In Ezra 6:21 בדרל refers to Israel separating herself from the unclean practices of the gentiles; in 9:1 it refers to a failure to separate from the detestable practices of the stereotypical ‘anti-elect’ nations, and similarly in 10:11 where a note about foreign wives is added. Ezra 9:1 & 10:11 are particularly interesting, for 9:1 ff appears to have Deut. 7:1 ff in mind, where חרם is now interpreted as בדרל. Thus the association of separation with חרם is clear, reflecting the much neglected Akkadian root ḥarāmu, developing its ‘second-order’ sense, the sense that is of existential significance regarding its use in Deuteronomy.

6.3 Summary

חרם in Deuteronomy shapes attitudes toward idols. Avoid idols and separate yourself from anything that is likely to lead to idolatry. The symbol evokes a sense of conflict in the struggle to do so. Josh. 23-24 do, therefore, provide a fitting and faithful portrait of how חרם is to be enacted, making explicit what it means to obey Deut. 7. But in neo-structuralist perspective deuteronomistic-חרם, in the ‘world of the text’ of Deuteronomy, can be viewed as constructing Israel’s identity by denying the possibility of mediation between Israel and the local peoples, made concrete in the avoidance of idolatry; any attempt to ‘mediate’ between categories results in death, symbolizing expulsion from the community, gaining the status of ‘outsider’. Josh. 23-24 indicates then how this ‘non-mediation’ is to be enacted in practice.

But does Joshua simply portray the fulfilment of Deut. 7, and of the wider Pentateuchal promises of the land, when, for example, so much narrative space is devoted to the sparing of Rahab, a Canaanite prostitute, and to the execution of Achan, an Israelite from the tribe of Judah? We must now turn to the text of Joshua to consider this. I shall argue that whilst in one sense Joshua does portray the fulfilment of Deut. 7 and of the promise of the land, its literary use of חרם is in fact far more subtle and searching, being used symbolically to pose probing questions concerning Israel's identity and self understanding, perhaps challenging some of the assumptions of Deuteronomy.

In conclusion, I have sought to 'clear the ground' of misconceptions of חרם , and the kind of material that we are dealing with so that we may 'hear' Joshua in a sense that is fitting to the text as an act of discourse, from which a plenitude of interpretations may arise that will use the text well.

Section III

Reading Joshua

Chapter 7

The text of Joshua

7.1 Differences in the textual witnesses to Joshua

The difficulties associated with the text of Joshua are vast. Space permits only a brief sketch of the issues, although, as I shall argue, the issues posed for a ‘mythical’ reading are rather different from those normally posed by textual criticism. There are many differences between the textual witnesses to Joshua, most notably between the LXX versions and the MT, but also between these and the fragmentary texts of Joshua discovered at Qumran (4QJosh^a (4Q47),¹ 4QJosh^b (4Q48)² and XJoshua³), which are the most ancient textual witness to Joshua,⁴ and there are a number of studies on the text.⁵ Many commentators discuss the differences, often with a view to seeking the ‘earliest recoverable text’, although only the more recent commentaries have the benefit of access to the Qumran witnesses, published in 1992 and 2000 (XJoshua).⁶ Whilst there are numerous minor differences amongst the witnesses, there are several major differences, ¹ Preserving Josh. 8:34-35, 5:2-7; 6:5-10; 7:12-17; 8:13-14, 18(?) & 10:2-5, 8-11; See E. Ulrich, ‘4QJosh^a’, in E. Ulrich (et al) (eds), Qumran Cave 4.IX. Deuteronomy, Joshua, Judges, Kings (DJD 14) (Oxford: Clarendon, 1995), pp.143-152.

² Preserving Josh. 2:11-12; 3:15-4:3 & 17:1-5, 11-15; See E. Tov, ‘4QJosh^b’, in DJD 14, pp.153-160.

³ Preserving fragments of Josh. 1:9-12 & 2:4-15; See J. Charlesworth, ‘XJoshua’, in J. Charlesworth (et al) (eds), Miscellaneous Texts from the Judean Desert (DJD 38) (Oxford: Clarendon, 2000), pp.231-239.

⁴ See M.N. van der Meer, Formation and Reformulation: The Redaction of the Book of Joshua in the Light of the oldest Textual Witnesses (Leiden: Brill, 2004), pp.93-114.

⁵ Most notably those of M.L. Margolis, (The Book of Joshua in Greek According to the Critically Restored Text with an Apparatus Containing the Variants of the Principal Recensions and of the Individual Witnesses (Paris: Librairie Orientaliste Paul Geuthner, 1931-1938), Part 5 (Philadelphia: Annenberg Research Institute, 1992)), A.G. Auld, (Joshua Retold: Synoptic Perspectives (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1998)), K. De Troyer, (Rewriting the Sacred Text: What the Old Greek Texts tell us about the Literary Growth of the Bible (Atlanta: SBL, 2003), esp. pp.29-58), and M.N. van der Meer (Formation and Reformulation: The Redaction of the Book of Joshua in the Light of the oldest Textual Witnesses (Leiden: Brill, 2004)).

⁶ The most helpful commentary in this regard is that of R.D. Nelson, Joshua (OTL) (Louisville: WJKP, 1997) (even though he does not have access to XJoshua) in which a translation of the MT is provided alongside a translation of the ‘earliest recoverable text’ based on the OG.

with the LXX generally witnessing to a considerably shorter text. I shall now consider some of the more significant differences.

The OG of Josh. 2:14 reads, 'The men said to her, "Our life in exchange for yours [pl]!"' She said, "When Yahweh gives you the city, deal loyally and faithfully with me." whilst the MT reads, 'The men said to her, "Our life in exchange for yours [pl]! If you [pl] do not tell this business of ours, when Yahweh gives us the land we will deal loyally and faithfully with you [sg]."' ⁷ Here, Nelson suggests that the differences exhibit an MT concern for secrecy, and an OG misreading that changes the speaker to Rahab for the second statement. If Nelson is correct, differences are explained by a differing emphasis in the OG, being a deliberate 'retelling' of the story, in addition to an 'error'.

Josh. 5 is perhaps one of the most notable differences between the three sets of witnesses. There are significant differences in 5:2-6 between the OG and the MT. The OG mentions two groups with reference to the circumcision that takes place; those born in the wilderness and those who left Egypt uncircumcised, although the emphasis is on those 'born on the way', and thus Nelson detects a theme of new beginnings reflected in the text of the OG, contrasting the two generations. But he argues that the MT modifies v.2-9 to improve its 'logic and orthodoxy', carefully specifying that all men of war had perished in the wilderness, and insists that all Israel had been circumcised at the exodus. Moreover, linking Passover with eating the harvest does not occur in the OG, with the link made only in the MT, and MT additions in v.10-12 seek to enhance the Passover's orthodoxy; careful distinction of the days is made, with unleavened bread being eaten on the day after Passover, reflecting Lev. 23:5-6 'and other P texts'. He suggests that eating unleavened bread originally had nothing to do with the ritual eating of unleavened bread, with it being co-ordinated through textual expansion in the MT; rather than being cultic, eating the unleavened bread here originally marked the transition in to the new land.⁸ However, van der Meer offers a different analysis, arguing that the MT preserves an earlier text with the OG reflecting a heavily interpretative translation of a Hebrew text similar to the MT to transform the story into a more plausible account of the events whilst exhibiting 'a concern for the individual responsibility for the disobedient behaviour of [the] older generation, and thus for the innocence of the Israelites of the younger generation'.⁹ Whichever reconstruction is correct, one may see that the text was used and developed according to particular concerns – either improving orthodoxy or emphasizing the innocence of the new generation.

⁷ Nelson, Joshua, p.39.

⁸ Ibid, pp.75-80.

Also notable is the difference in Josh. 5 between 4QJosh^a, the OG and the MT, for the account of the altar building (8:30-35 in the MT) occurs, with minor differences, after 9:2 in the OG, and before 5:2 in 4QJosh^a. Nelson suggests that the OG would connect the 'kings' reaction immediately to the story of Ai', whereas 4QJosh^a emphasizes the fulfillment of Deut. 27, the command being fulfilled as soon as Israel had crossed the Jordan, concluding that 'this unit is manifestly disconnected from its context whichever of the three possible locations one chooses.'¹⁰ Perhaps the MT emphasizes 'all systems go' after the ambiguities and difficulties in relation to Rahab, Achan, Jericho and Ai, whereas the placement of the pericopae in 4QJosh^a, whilst emphasizing the fulfillment of Deut. 27, also draws torah together with circumcision and Passover, being three 'pillars' of Israelite identity, into this momentous occasion of crossing into the land, emphasizing the nature of Israel's identity. Thus from a mythical perspective, one sees how different emphases are given to different aspects of the story in different ways of telling and using it.

There are many places where the OG is shorter, but where, although details are omitted, the gist of the text remains the same, even if different emphases may emerge. Nelson, for example, suggests that much of 6:3b-6, as well as some of 6:7-15 (MT) reflect additions to an earlier text represented by the OG, where the processional aspects are less explicit in the earlier text, and so the MT appears to reflect an emphasizing of ritual procession over the OG.¹¹ Likewise, the MT of 8:9-17 is longer than the OG and 4QJosh^a, and although the narrative may be 'rough and confused' as Nelson suggests, the overall gist of the story is similar in each account (that Joshua leads a successful ambush attack on Ai), although Joshua's role is more prominent in the MT.¹² Nelson prefers the thesis that the OG reflects an earlier text, with the MT an expansion, whilst van der Meer views the OG as a condensed and simplified version of the story as found in the MT that arises largely through translation technique.¹³

⁹ van der Meer, Formation, pp.408-415.

¹⁰ Nelson, Joshua, p.117.

¹¹ Ibid, pp.83-85.

Another sort of difference is demonstrated in Josh. 10. Josh. 10:15, 'Then Joshua returned and all Israel with him, to camp at Gilgal' (and similarly 10:43) appear to reflect MT additions. De Troyer comments, 'The Old Greek is a witness to a pre-Masoretic text of Joshua, in which Gilgal did not play an important role. The place Gilgal, however, became crucial during the second century B.C.E., so it was imported into the Hebrew story of Joshua.'¹⁴ Again, these additions (presuming them to be such) are a further reflection of the 'mythical character' of Joshua, in that Joshua developed to meet the needs and circumstances of the community that used it so as to be a relevant, imaginative cultural resource to help the community shape and interpret its present life; it is a living rather than inert text. Such use witnesses to Joshua's ongoing significance in shaping the life of Israel.

However, in the account of the settlement of the land by the Danites, in 19:47-48 the OG offers a longer text in which Judah captures Leshem (LXX^A, or Lachish (LXX^B)) following the failure of the Danites to expel the Amorites. Nelson prefers the MT as a witness to an earlier text.¹⁵ Likewise, the account of Joshua's death in 24:29-33 (MT) is longer in the OG, although again Nelson favours the MT as reflecting an earlier text, arguing that the OG seeks to coordinate the story with the continuation of the national story in Judges.¹⁶ Moreover, the OG locates Joshua's farewell speech at Shiloh rather ¹² Ibid, p.110.

¹³ van der Meer, Formation, pp.476-478. He suggests that tensions arise in the MT owing to DtrH additions to a pre-DtrH account, tensions that the OG seeks to resolve. See also E. Tov, 'Midrash-type Exegesis in the LXX of Joshua', in Revue Biblique 85 (1978), pp.50-61 for discussion of ways of understanding the significance of the differences between the MT and LXX.

¹⁴ De Troyer, Rewriting, p.30. She expands on this, arguing that Modein, the 'headquarters' of the Maccabean revolt became a 'quasi-Gilgal', signifying a new beginning for Israel (pp.57-58).

¹⁵ Nelson, Joshua, pp.225-226.

¹⁶ Ibid, pp.280-283.

than Shechem (24:1) ‘in order to harmonize with 18:1 and with the presence of the tabernacle at Shiloh (22:12, 29) to which a Greek plus in v.25 alludes’.¹⁷ However, he suggests ‘harmonization’ in a different direction in the account of the cities of refuge (20:3-6), in which the MT considerably expands the OG in order to coordinate the text with Num. 35:25 & Deut. 19:1-13.¹⁸

This brief sketch of the different textual witness indicates the main difficulties associated with the text of Joshua. Whilst Nelson tends to prefer to view the OG as a witness to an earlier text than the MT in favour of the hypothesis that the OG shortened texts to give them greater coherence,¹⁹ one sees, through van der Meer’s analysis that, as Auld notes, cautions remain in assuming that the LXX is a ‘crown witness for an originally shorter Hebrew text’.²⁰ Indeed, it is not clear that the OG witnesses to a different, earlier text than the MT (or vice versa), since differences may be the result of deliberate changes to the text that reflect different emphases concerning the use of the text. In mythical terms, such development can be viewed as the crystallization of what the community sees as being (perhaps latently) implied in an earlier text, or an attempt to improve and clarify it. Alternatively, some developments in the text might reflect ‘confusions’ that distort the text, such as the likely additions of Josh. 6:19 & 24 that reflect a priestly conception of חֶרֶם that skews the text, but nonetheless reflects the use of the text in a new context. Or, some changes can be more ‘imposed’ on the text to ‘force’ its relevance in a particular context, again demonstrating the importance of ‘use’. In other words, the whole process of Joshua’s transmission is associated with redaction and use as much as with copying and preservation, and so, especially from a mythical perspective, the quest for an ‘earliest recoverable text’ appears misguided, since it fails to account for use and development. So perhaps the problem is that of determining the ‘best’ version of the text to use; additions to a text might ‘improve’ it by clarifying and developing it, or they might skew or distort

¹⁷ Ibid, p.264.

¹⁸ Ibid, p.227.

¹⁹ Ibid, p.110.

²⁰ Auld, Joshua, p.145.

it. The problem is one of deciding which reasonably ‘stable’ or ‘mature’ version of the text ought to be preferred.²¹

7.2 The significance of the choice of text for Christian reading

Should one prefer essentially the Hebrew or the Greek text as Christian Scripture, given that the Old Testament was often read and quoted in the New Testament and in the early church in the Greek? If, as argued in chapters 2-3 reception and use are important and contribute to the ‘normativity’ of the use of a text in shaping a community, then arguably the Christian interpreter could, or even should, read the Old Testament in the Greek versions, as the Orthodox church does. However, this introduces a difficulty beyond that of ‘text’, for it raises the question of transformation of meaning in translation. Of particular importance here is the translation of חָרַם, for it is rendered as ἀνάθεμα in the Greek (e.g. in Josh. 6:17), which is a crucial interpretative move that sets up all sorts of resonances and allusions that are not present in the Hebrew.²² For example, one might expect the use of ἀνάθεμα in Gal. 3:13 (citing Deut. 21:23, applied to the crucifixion) to set up a resonance with its use in Joshua in the Greek, which (returning to Hebrew) might serve as the basis for a typology in which חָרַם could be said to be ‘fulfilled’ in Jesus on the cross, in that he takes the ‘חָרַם of the world’ onto himself,²³ perhaps reflecting a ‘substitutionary’ understanding of the crucifixion. But it is interesting that there is no evidence of that sort of move being made in the early Christian tradition, despite the imaginative use made of similar typology, which might suggest that there was little interest in interpreting the crucifixion through categories of ‘substitutionary atonement’ in the early church.²⁴

²¹ This idea is similar but not identical to that of the ‘final form’.

²² A similar problem occurs with translating חָרַם into English. Rendering it as ‘destroy’ shifts the meaning of the term, for Hebrew has other words for destroy (e.g. שָׁמַד) distinct from חָרַם.

²³ Cf. R.S. Hess: ‘Christ takes upon himself the sin of the world and becomes the victim of the holy war that God wages against sin (2 Cor. 5:21).’ (Joshua (TOTC) (Leicester: IVP, 1996), p.46).

²⁴ Indeed, there appears to be little interest in the concept of ‘justification’ in this period, an exception being Origen’s commentary on Romans in which he understands justification to occur through what might be termed the ‘willed afflictions’ of the Christian as they participate in Christ’s suffering which ‘occurs by dying to sin, and, if necessary, dying as a witness of Christ’. (K.D. Hall, ‘Afflicted for Love: Willed Affliction and Salvation in Origen’s Commentary on Romans’, paper given at the Durham Patristics Seminar, 7th February 2008).

However, whilst the Greek versions of the Old Testament shaped the early church, the MT has generally been favoured by Christian scholars over the last few centuries, and thus has been the privileged version for translations of the Bible into the vernacular, and thus the version of the text that has most shaped the contemporary church. Thus in terms of reception and use both the OG and MT versions have certain claims to normativity. But as noted in chapter 3 the job of interpretation is worked out in the dialectic between the significance of the ‘original’ act of discourse and later significance and usage, and thus if the original pole is to be favoured, then the earliest recoverable text would be favoured.

7.3 Summary

The difficulties with the text of Joshua, and the choice of text for use, are, at one level, immense. Even though space prevents detailed discussion of the variations in the versions, it is not clear which version ought to be favoured in any case – an earlier ‘original’ form or a later ‘improvement’, so I shall take the pragmatic decision to favour the MT, largely on the basis of its general privileging today. But, at another level, as we have seen, whilst there are numerous differences between the textual witnesses, in most cases they represent changes in emphasis rather than gist, and so in most cases the concern is largely an academic and historical one, rather than a concern for the Christian who wishes to ‘use’ the text.

Chapter 8

Reading Joshua

In this chapter I shall read Joshua ‘chapter by chapter’ providing something of a commentary (although not a full one) on the text and on how it has been interpreted in the tradition, in a somewhat descriptive fashion. Then in chapter 9, I shall develop what it might mean to read Joshua as Christian Scripture today in a more constructive sense, drawing all the threads of the discussion together.

8.1 Josh. 1

Josh. 1 provides a summary, and perhaps theological interpretation, of Joshua as a whole, comprising of four speeches (vv.2-9, 10-11, 12-15, 16-18) that centre on crossing, conquest, allocation of land, and obedience to law. It reflects a number of quotations from or allusions to Deuteronomy (e.g. Deut. 7:24; 11:24-25; 17:18-19),¹ suggesting that Joshua interprets and is to be interpreted by Deuteronomy. Moreover, Brevard Childs suggests that Josh. 1, 12 & 23 reflect the shaping of Joshua’s final form which provide a framework that offers an ‘elaborate and highly reflective theological interpretation of the conquest of the land’.² Josh. 1 also provides continuity with Israel’s story thus far, and so read canonically Joshua becomes a part of the history of Israel (as narrative). It also ‘legitimizes’ the book, being set in an important prototypical time with the voices of YHWH, Moses and Joshua appearing to coalesce.³

However, there are themes that one might expect to find here, but do not. Particularly significant is the absence of חרם and of any other term such as שמר that might imply that genocide or destruction is central to the book. If Josh. 1 does provide a theological summary of the book, then the absence of נחם here is striking, which might suggest that Joshua is not really ‘about’ conquest at all. Moreover, another significant absence, both here and elsewhere in Joshua, is any reference to the sinfulness of the nations that are to be driven out; the Canaanites etc. are not mentioned here. Nowhere does Joshua seek to explain or justify the extermination of the Canaanites because of their sinfulness, unlike Deuteronomy (e.g. Deut. 9:4-5).⁴ Whilst their sinfulness may be implied from the cultural context, this absence is significant, again suggesting that Joshua is not trying to justify conquest. But does this reflect a faithful and fitting ‘commentary’ on the book, whether it is a later addition or not? I will argue that it does.

¹ R.D. Nelson, Joshua (OTL) (Louisville: Westminster John Knox Press, 1997), pp.28-29.

² B.S. Childs, Introduction to the Old Testament as Scripture (Philadelphia: Fortress Press, 1979), p.244. As I indicated in chapter 4, I am not concerned with seeking to trace ‘redactional layers’; rather, I am concerned with whether or not material such as Josh. 1 provides a good or fitting interpretation and ‘commentary’ of the book, and with how it might guide interpretation of the material, whether it is a later addition or not.

³ Cf. L.D. Hawk, Joshua (Berit Olam) (Collegeville: The Liturgical Press, 2000), p.6; R. Polzin, Moses and the Deuteronomist: A Literary Study of the Deuteronomistic History (New York: Seabury Press, 1980), p.75.

These unexpected absences are complemented by what might seem to be unexpected transformations of military exhortation language. Michael Fishbane suggests that encased in the military exhortation formula (1:5-9) is a piece of ‘aggadic theologizing’ where Joshua is said to be strong and courageous in obeying torah, reflecting the transformation of physical prowess into spiritual fortitude, generating a new emphasis on the ideology of torah. Victory becomes conditional upon obedience to torah, and conquest is transformed from something inevitable and assured, based on ancient promises, into an event dependent upon faithfulness to covenant, reflecting the Deuteronomist’s theology of history.⁵ Thus the rhetoric of promise is synthesized with that of obedience, setting up a fruitful dialectic that enables human and divine faithfulness to be explored. The struggles and pain associated with warfare become metaphors for obeying the law, providing affectual, existential contours that describe the nature of torah obedience. But these struggles are held in tension with promise. So we see the possibility for a ‘spiritualizing’ emphasis at the very beginning of Joshua, something that might set our expectations for the book. Indeed, as well as an emphasis on obedience, a major theme is the gift of the land, with נָתַן occurring 8x in Josh. 1, a gift that represents fundamental confessional language throughout the book (2:9, 14, 24; 5:6; 8:1; 9:24; 18:3; 22:4; 23:13, 15-16,

⁴ Apart, perhaps from Josh. 11:19. Cf. E.F. Davis, ‘Critical Traditioning: Seeking an Inner Biblical Hermeneutic’, in ATR 82:4 (2000), pp.733-751.

⁵ M. Fishbane, Biblical Interpretation in Ancient Israel (Oxford: Clarendon, corrected ed. 1986), pp.384-388.

24:13),⁶ being important for understanding Israel's perception of her relationship to the land.

But the special quality of life in the land given by YHWH is נוח, 'rest', (1:13, 15), which represents the consummation of Joshua's career (Josh. 21:44, 22:4, 23:1).⁷ Butler suggests that נוח, "rest," is the new word of promise in this section. The term has a variety of contexts within the OT. The cult speaks of "divine deliverance" to the individual as bringing rest (Ps. 116:7; 23:2; Jer. 45:3; Job 3:13, 26; cf. Exod. 33:14). It also speaks of the cult as the place of divine resting (Ps. 132:8, 14; 1 Chr. 28:2; cf. the earlier ark tradition of Num. 10:33, 36; contrast the later prophecy Isa. 66:1). The early Sabbath commandments spoke of human rest (Exod. 23:12; cf. Deut. 5:14), which the priests reinterpreted to speak of divine rest (Exod. 20:11; cf. Gen. 2:2-4, שבת). The term appears also to have roots in early legal language (2 Sam. 14:17).

Isaiah used the term to apply to the life God desired for his people, who rejected it (28:12). Prophecy then eschatologized the term (Isa. 14:3, 7; 11:20; 32:18; cf. Dan. 12:13). Prophetic schools also used the term to speak of the gift of the divine spirit (Num. 11:25-26; 2 Kgs. 2:15), a usage that also became eschatologized (Isa. 11:2; 63:14; Zech. 6:8).

The Deuteronomistic school took up the term so widely used to speak of peace and rest from the problems of life and gave it a specific theological meaning: rest from war and enemies (Deut. 3:20; 12:9-10; 25:19). Our passage takes precisely this line from Deut. 3:20 and points it a step forward to its eventual realization (Josh. 21:44; 22:4; 23:1).

... Rest, not war, is the ultimate goal of Israel for the Deuteronomist. But he sees the dialectic that rest could be won only through war.⁸

These are important comments, reflecting the desire that Joshua expresses, when Joshua is read from the kind of psychological perspective discussed in chapter 2, and thus its latent eschatological character.

Another Leitwort in Josh. 1 which resounds throughout the book is עבר, used here in the sense of crossing the Jordan.⁹ Boundaries, and their crossing, will be important throughout Joshua, with the Jordan crossing being the parade example. Indeed, Israel begins her journey by crossing the Jordan.¹⁰ But the 'Jordan valley not only constitutes a boundary but also a defining symbol and a point of reference. Traversing it signifies Israel's entry into the measure of life YHWH gives.'¹¹ We will see how this theme of

⁶ Nelson, Joshua, p.31.

⁷ Ibid, p.31.

⁸ T.C. Butler, Joshua (WBC 7) (Waco: Word Books, 1983), pp.21-22.

⁹ עבר occurs here in 1:2, 11 (twice), 14 (twice) & 15, and 81x in Joshua.

¹⁰ Hawk, Joshua, p.6.

¹¹ Ibid, p.15.

crossing into (or out of) life with YHWH is recapitulated throughout Joshua. But for now, we may observe the symbolic character of the land, where the land symbolizes Israel's life with YHWH, and that crossing into the land (Israel) symbolizes crossing into this life in its fullness (as the fulfilment of promise). This symbolism is reinforced by the attention given to the Transjordan tribes (1:12-18). Here, they affirm Joshua's authority and respond in the most positive way possible (something that the other tribes are not reported as doing), indicating that they are indeed crossing into the fullness of life with YHWH, even if not the land.¹² Finally, the repeated use of כָּל (all/every)¹³ is indicative of this fullness and completeness in all its aspects; of complete obedience to torah, of complete possession of the land, and of the unity of all Israel.

Attention to these themes is suggestive of the kind of existential significance developed in section I. Butler's comments indicate that the idea of rest already has an eschatological trajectory, and is thus, perhaps, capable of construal in traditional Christian categories, finding continued significance in a Christian context; from the kind of 'mythical perspective' developed in section I, the idea of 'life in the land' may find continuing significance, construed as symbolic of life in the eschaton, or of life in the 'kingdom of God' to use a New Testament idiom. If, as we shall see, Joshua may be understood in terms of just what it means to possess the land and live in the land in the fullness of life that YHWH gives so as to move toward 'rest', then it suggests that in the Christian context Joshua might relate to what it means to live so as to possess or inherit the kingdom of God, an idea that will need further exploration.

Such attention to the symbolism makes Calvin's comments on the Promise Land intelligible,¹⁴ as it does Origen's homily on the text, which illustrates the existential development of some of the themes identified above in a new context:

[W]e understand the promise to us from our Lord Jesus that "every place we set the soles of our feet" will be ours. But let us not imagine that we may be able to enter into this inheritance yawning and drowsy, through ease and negligence. The wrath of his own race possesses the angel [Lucifer]. Unless you vanquish this [wrath] in yourself and cut off all violent impulses of anger and rage, you will not be able to claim as an inheritance the place that angel once had. For you will not expel him from the land of promise by your slothfulness. In like manner, some angels incite pride, jealousy, greed and lust and instigate these evil things. Unless you gain the mastery over their vices in yourself and exterminate them from your land - which now through the grace of baptism has been sanctified - you will not receive the fullness of the promised inheritance.¹⁵

¹² Cf. Hawk, Joshua, p.15.

¹³ Occurring 14x in Josh. 1.

¹⁴ Inst. II.11.1, pp.450-451, cf. chapter 2. It is interesting that Calvin develops this typology of the land in his Institutes, but not in his commentary on Joshua. Perhaps this indicates a tension between Calvin's appropriation of the tradition of interpretation that he has received with his own exegetical preferences.

Origen's homily may be construed not an exegesis of the text as such, even though it is a development of themes found in the text, but as an imaginative exploration of the significance of the symbolism in a new context as a development of the original act of discourse, using the idea of conquest as 'struggle' to affectually intimate something of the nature of the Christian life, and how this relates to the Christian taking possession of their inheritance, perhaps reflecting a 'new myth' that might be revelatory in its own right. Whilst reading the text in a rather different way,¹⁶ Calvin's comments on the text are not too far removed from Origen's:

From this passage, therefore, let us learn that we can never be fit for executing difficult and arduous matters unless we exert our utmost endeavours, both because our abilities are weak, and Satan rudely assails us, and there is nothing we are more inclined to than to relax our efforts. But, as many exert their strength to no purpose in making erroneous or desultory attempts, it is added as a true source of fortitude that Joshua shall make it his constant study to observe the Law. By this we are taught that the only way in which we can become truly invincible is by striving to yield a faithful obedience to God. Otherwise it were better to lie indolent and effeminate than to be hurried on by headlong audacity.¹⁷

In a sense then, traditional readings manifest what it is in the original act of discourse that can be developed, in an imaginative existential manner, to find enduring significance in a Christian context.

8.2 Josh. 2

Josh. 2 is cast as a spy story, reflecting a common biblical motif relating to preparation for conquest (Num. 13:1ff; Deut. 1:22ff; Josh. 7:2ff; Judg. 1:23ff; 18:2ff). But is it really a spy story? The spies do no reconnaissance. They do not return with any strategically useful information, and they are not criticised for this. Something else is going on. In addition to recalling the 'failed' mission of Num. 13, via the note that spies are sent from ¹⁵ Hom. Josh. 1.6, p.34.

¹⁶ I.e., I think that Origen reads the text within a 'spiritualizing' (or perhaps 'allegorizing') frame of reference whilst Calvin appears to wish to develop the 'literal sense' of the text in what seems to be more of a 'moralizing' direction, showing concern with 'the Law' for example, even if he also introduces Satan. But it is interesting that the two forms of interpretation appear to converge in terms of the practical implications drawn from the text.

¹⁷ J. Calvin, Commentaries on the Book of Joshua (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, ET: 1949), pp.30-31.

Shittim and go immediately to a prostitute's house, Num. 25 is evoked (in which Israelites staying at Shittim engaged in sexual activity with the Moabite women, who then led the Israelites into worshipping other gods, resulting in disaster) leading the reader to expect disaster following the upbeat start of Josh. 1. Indeed, the spies went and entered the house of a prostitute named Rahab and slept or lay there (Josh. 2:1).¹⁸ Recent commentators detect innuendo here with the use of the verb שָׁכַב,¹⁹ and allusions to Numbers are reinforced through the prostitute's name, Rahab, since the spies in Num. 13:21 went as far as Rehob. The possibility of innuendo is also strengthened through the name Rahab, since rhb is used in Ugaritic epic to refer to female genitals.²⁰

Having set the reader up to expect disaster, the story takes a new twist, losing interest in questions of sex, but with a further expectation of disaster introduced by the king sending messengers to Rahab. But then the story unfolds rather unexpectedly. Rahab hides the spies, lies to the king's messengers, and lowers the spies to safety outside the city giving whilst instructing them how to avoid capture. But crucially, in doing so, Rahab recounts significant events in Israel's story and makes the spies swear an oath to spare her.

The two major theological difficulties identified by commentators are the questions of how Rahab's deception is to be viewed, and of how the agreement she makes with the spies is understood in relation to the חֻמֵּי laws. Interestingly, the first difficulty seems to be more of an issue for earlier writers such as Augustine²¹ and Calvin,²² with the second being more an issue for more recent commentators. There is no explicit evaluation given on either point, either through the narrator, or Joshua, or YHWH. Moreover, the resolution of the story is postponed until Josh. 6 whilst one wonders what will happen;

¹⁸ יִלְכּוּ וַיָּבֹאוּ בֵּית-אִשָּׁה זֹנָה וּשְׁמָהּ רַחַב וַיִּשְׁכְּבוּ-שָׁמָּה

¹⁹ E.g. Hawk, Joshua, p.40; J.F.D. Creach, Joshua (Interpretation) (Louisville: John Knox Press, 2003), p.32; Nelson, Joshua, p.43.

²⁰ Creach, Joshua, p.32. Moreover F.A. Spina suggests that the scarlet cord evokes erotic and sexual imagery, being a sign of prostitution (The Faith of the Outsider: Exclusion and Inclusion in the Biblical Story (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2005), p.62). However Hawk thinks the 'reddish colour at the window recalls the Israelite deliverance from death in Egypt (Ex. 12:1-32)' (Joshua, p.49) whilst Creach finds the virtuous wife of Prov. 31:10-31 (esp. 31:13, 21) evoked here (Joshua, pp.38-39). Let the reader decide!

²¹ Against Lying 15.31-32, in ACCS, p.10.

²² Joshua, pp.46-48.

will Rahab be saved? Is the oath a violation of torah that will result in the premature end of the ‘conquest’? But even in Josh. 6 no explicit evaluation is provided.

For now I would like to consider Rahab’s characterization and character. Rahab is presented as the paradigmatic outsider – a Canaanite prostitute living in Jericho. The reader expects her to be trouble. But as the story unfolds one sees that appearances are deceptive. As Frank Spina observes, Rahab is certain that YHWH has given Israel the land, demonstrating trust in YHWH, and he observes that the phrase used by Rahab in 2:11, is only used elsewhere by Moses (Deut. 4:39) and Solomon (1 Kg. 8:23), placing her in the most esteemed company; her ‘confession’ is, arguably, better than Joshua’s,²³ and she recites and interprets the major events of Israel’s recent past. Moreover, the way she deals with the spies is interpreted using the fundamental covenant characteristic of חסד, and she appeals to the חסד that she has shown as the basis for her hope (2:12). Indeed

כי יהוה אלהיכם הוא אלהים בשמים ממעל ועל-הארץ מתחת

כי-עשיתי עמכם חסד

(lit. ‘because I have ‘done hesed’ with you) evokes a number of texts,²⁴ and perhaps particularly significantly

ועשה חסד לאלפים לאהבי

(Deut. 5:10, Ex. 20:6) granted its context in the Decalogue as that which characterizes the way that YHWH deals with Israel, and indeed in the command relating to avoiding idolatry. Likewise חסד characterizes YHWH in the foundational Ex. 34:6-7, and חסד is also identified in Mic. 6:8 as one of the three characteristics that are what it essentially is that YHWH requires of the Israelite. Thus Rahab, despite appearing the paradigmatic outsider, actually manifests precisely that which characterizes the relationship between YHWH and Israel, and relationships between Israelites, and thus displays the characteristics (in terms of action and ‘confession’) precisely of that which is to characterize the ‘insider’. It is interesting that her act of deception (also an act of courage perhaps), and hiding the spies, is interpreted as an act of חסד, suggesting that it is to be construed positively, perhaps unlike much traditional Christian interpretation that has, through ‘new myths’, been preoccupied with other concerns alien to the story. So provisionally, in other words, perhaps the ‘tension’ here that the interpreter works in draws the interpreter toward privileging the original act of discourse, rather than its later development.

²³ Spina, Faith, pp.57-61.

²⁴ Interestingly it occurs in Genesis in ways that also indicate that ‘outsiders’ sometimes ‘do better’ than ‘insiders’; e.g. in relation to Abraham and Abimelech (20:13, where Abraham seems to ‘misuse’ חסד, 21:23 whereas Abimelech grasps it).

Moreover, חסד is a term that occurs in Deut. 7:12 in the context of YHWH keeping his covenant according to what he שבוע (swore) to the ancestors, another term important in Josh. 2 (2:12, 17 & 20). But it is Deut. 7 (7:1-6) that provides the חרם injunction, describing what Israel must do when they enter the land, and here it is Rahab who uses the term for the first time in Joshua (2:10), which indeed is the only mention of the word until Joshua uses it in 6:17. In other words the reader is now disorientated and bewildered; all the locals were to be exterminated (or so it seems) according to Deut. 7, but here is a local who, despite appearances, acts in every way like the best Israelite, but ironically, herself raises the question of Deut. 7. Thus the story of Rahab may reflect a demanding test case of Deut. 7.²⁵ Should the spies have sworn an oath to save her? What will happen to her? We must wait until Josh. 6 to find out.

8.3 Josh. 3-4

The space devoted to the Jordan crossing, together with its repetitive, slow narration imbues it with significance. Perhaps the mode of narration encourages the reader to imaginatively enter the experience and marvel at how YHWH brought Israel through the Jordan and into the land. Josh. 3-4 narrates how YHWH powerfully brought a unified Israel from the ‘liminal’ wilderness across a boundary to bring Israel into her land, resulting in fear leading to discouragement for the Canaanites, etc., and fear leading to obedience (4:24) together with encouragement (3:10) for the Israelites, and Joshua’s exaltation (3:7; 4:14). The narrative ‘looks back’ to the exodus sea crossing to interpret the significance of the events (4:23), and ‘looks ahead’ to future generations of Israel with memorials (4:20, etc.).

²⁵ Cf. Polzin, Moses, p.87.

The ark is introduced for the first time in Joshua and it plays a prominent role here.

Creach notes that

The portrait of the ark and its impact seems to include something from virtually every Old Testament voice. The ark is known by the familiar label “ark of the covenant” (3:6, 8, 14; 4:9), which is the favorite language of the Deuteronomistic tradition; it is also called “ark of the testimony” (4:16), a title that derives from Priestly circles. The effect of the ark upon the waters of Jordan is similar to the portrayal in stories that understand the object as the invisible throne of God that scatters Israel’s enemies (Num. 10:35-36) and accounts of the ark striking people dead with its supernatural energy (1 Sam. 6:19). The recognition of Levitical priests as bearers of the ark and the order for the people to remain at a distance from it (3:3-4) resemble the Chronicler’s view that the Levites had exclusive responsibility for carrying the sacred chest (1 Chron. 15:2). Most significant is the fact that some of the traditions that give rise to these descriptions and portraits of the ark disagree as to the significance of the object. This point has been classically expressed as follows: some circles saw the ark as representative of the presence of God (2 Sam. 6:2), while the Deuteronomistic tradition downplayed its importance and spoke of it as a container for the Ten Commandments (Deut. 10:1-5).²⁶

Moreover, given the importance of ‘rest’ in Joshua (cf. Josh. 1), the ark’s role in Num. 10:33 understood in terms of leading the people to a place of rest

וארון ברית־יהוה נסע לפניהם דרך שלשת ימים לתור להם מנוחה
is probably significant.²⁷ Thus whilst this story probably has a complicated history in which both priestly and deuteronomistic elements are present, the fusion of portraits reflects testimony to the fusion of the priestly and deuteronomistic traditions that we discussed in chapter 4, encouraging one to see the powerful presence of YHWH here reflected in the ark, being associated with the covenant and obedience to the Decalogue, even if it is, perhaps, the more priestly images that dominate, indicating the ‘real presence’ of YHWH among Israel, leading and guiding, present in the midst of the crossing of an insurmountable boundary.²⁸

That the Jordan crossing represents the crossing of an important boundary is emphasized by the very dense use of עבר (22x in 41 verses), marking the transition of a wandering people into a people with land, a land flowing with milk and honey, representing a change of status. As in Josh. 1, national unity is stressed, demonstrated in the twelve-stone memorial (4:1-3, 8, 20) with the half-tribes explicitly included (4:12). But the significance of עבר is illustrated in Deut. 29:11 & 30:18, and the development of these texts in the Community Rule, 1QS, which uses עבר to describe 'crossing into' the covenant, which is identified with 'crossing' into the community, reflecting the reception of the text that testifies to the kind of interpretation suggested. Indeed, 1QS i.16f reads, 'All who enter the order of the community shall cross (עבר) into the covenant in God's presence and do all that he commanded' and W.H. Brownlee notes that the community rule contains a 'liturgy' that enacts this crossing, a 'crossing ceremony' that is associated with lustration (1QS ii.25-iii.12),²⁹ and suggests that

²⁶ Creach, Joshua, p.48.

²⁷ נָחַם occurs here in Josh. 3:13; 4:3, 8, possibly indicating the use of a Leitwort.

²⁸ See also G.W. Coats, ‘The Ark of the Covenant in Joshua: A probe into the history of a tradition’, in Hebrew Annual Review 9 (1985), pp.137-157.

The fact that [Deuteronomy] 29:11 indicates the intention of "crossing into the sworn covenant" and 30:18 speaks of "crossing the Jordan" may have led the people of Qumrân to equate the two uses of the verb 'ābar. Symbolically one was also passing over into the land which God had promised the patriarchs by covenant. This suits the military character of the procession as depicted in the Community Rule, making of the event an annual memorial of the Conquest.³⁰

Moreover, he notes that the instructions for the order of the procession in the ceremony (1QS ii.19-25) evoke the instructions for the procession in Joshua. So the 'crossing' ceremony in the community is a form of 're-enactment' of the Jordan crossing in a new context, inspired by Joshua. In other words the community uses Joshua to (imaginatively) shape and interpret its existence, as 'crossing into new life', something developed in Josh. 5.

The crossing of the Jordan has a clear 'typological' link with the exodus sea crossing, understood as a mighty act of liberation testifying to YHWH's power (e.g. Ex. 14:15-18; 15:1-21), and forms an interpretative lens through which to read the Jordan crossing (cf. Josh. 4:23).³¹ If the exodus crossing is to be interpreted as a redemptive act via creation ²⁹ W.H. Brownlee, 'The Ceremony of Crossing the Jordan in the Annual Covenanting at Qumran', in W.C. Delsman, et al, eds., Von Kanaan bis Kerala: Festschrift für Prof. Mag. Dr. Dr. J.P.M. van der Ploeg O.P. zur Vollendung des siebzigsten Lebensjahres am 4. Juli 1979 (Verlag Butzon & Bercker, 1982), pp.295-302, here pp.297-298.

³⁰ Ibid., p.300.

³¹ Cf. Fishbane, Biblical Interpretation, pp.350-363.

themes, with YHWH ‘creating’ a people for himself in the deliverance at the sea,³² then one may interpret the Jordan crossing as symbolic of another instance of YHWH’s creative action. If life in the Promised Land represents life in all its fullness for Israel, then the crossing of the Jordan is the creation of and entrance into this new life. Indeed, it is significant that elsewhere the Jordan is not presented as a barrier to crossing into the land (cf. Gen. 32:11; Josh. 2:7; 22:19, 24-25; Judg. 3:28; 8:4; 10:9; 12:5; 2 Sam. 17:22),³³ which accentuates the symbolic nature of the mode of crossing here, and its ‘mythical’ nature in both the traditional sense and the other senses developed in chapter 2. Thus Nelson suggests that the miraculous Jordan crossing is symbolic, ideological and confessional in significance (Josh. 24:11; Ps. 66:6; Mic. 6:4-5).³⁴

However, the narrative also interprets the symbol as a witness to the power of YHWH to the peoples of the ארץ (earth/land)³⁵, and to Israel, so that they might ‘fear’ YHWH (4:24), probably to be construed in terms of obeying YHWH:³⁶

למען דעת כל-עמי הארץ את-יד יהוה כי חזקה היא
למען יראתם את-יהוה אלהיכם כל-הימים

Furthermore it is also interpreted as encouragement for Israel, so that Israel would know that the ‘living God’ is amongst them, and that he will drive out the Canaanites, etc. (3:9-13). But Josh. 3:7 (cf. 4:14) gives another interpretation of the water crossing; that Joshua would be exalted, and so that he, and Israel, would know that YHWH was with Joshua just as he was with Moses, legitimating Joshua. The narrative presents the events relating ³² See T.E. Fretheim, Exodus (Interpretation) (Louisville: John Knox Press, 1991), pp.158ff; J.D. Levenson, Creation and the Persistence of Evil (Princeton: Princeton UP, 1988), pp.75-77.

³³ Cf. Nelson, Joshua, p.59 & D. Jobling, ‘The Jordan as a Boundary’: Transjordan in Israel’s Ideological Geography’, in The Sense of Biblical Narrative: Structural Analyses in the Hebrew Bible II (JSOTSup 39) (Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1986), pp.88-134, here pp.125-126.

³⁴ Nelson, Joshua, pp.59-60.

³⁵ ארץ might be taken either way. Possibly it referred to the Promised Land alone in its original context, but in light of the development of the idea that YHWH is lord of all the earth it reads naturally as a witness to all the earth in a later context.

³⁶ See R.W.L. Moberly, The Bible, Theology and Faith (Cambridge Studies in Christian Doctrine) (Cambridge: CUP, 2000), pp.80-97 for a discussion of the idiom of fearing YHWH.

to the crossing as נפלאות (3:5), which, portraying the action of YHWH, by its very nature provides a rich, polyvalent symbol.³⁷

Confessionally, when existentially appropriated the event provides a way of speaking of what YHWH has done ‘for us/me’.³⁸ And this seems to be reflected in Ps. 66 where YHWH’s נורא עלילה ‘awesome deed(s)’ (v.5), such as the sea crossing (v.6)³⁹ are used as the grammar of discourse for the psalmist to interpret and reflect upon ‘what God has done for me’ (v.16); this symbol provides the means by which one may praise God for the way that he acts in my life. So from the perspective of cultural memory, such symbols provide a rich cultural resource that forms a grammar of discourse for the description of experience of God. Indeed, Walter Brueggemann begins his Old Testament theology at essentially this point, in a confessional mode noting that, ‘the beginning point for articulating an Old Testament theology is in the liturgical, public acknowledgement of a new reality wrought by Yahweh in the life of the speaker and in the community of the speaker.’⁴⁰

Combining the imaginative use of symbols such as the Jordan Crossing to describe and confess what God has done ‘for us/me’, the observation that this crossing is related to entrance into life in its fullness, then, given the presence of water it is not surprising that Christian interpreters have used this passage in relation to baptism. An interesting discussion of the traditional Christian interpretation of the Jordan crossing is Daniélou’s discussion of Gregory of Nyssa’s mystical writings:

Gregory’s doctrine on Baptism makes use of the various Biblical types, especially the crossing of the Red Sea. In another image which he uses we find the River Jordan considered as one of the rivers of Paradise, and this symbolism stresses the idea of rebirth—Baptism is thus represented as a return to the Garden of Eden. The entrance into the baptistery means that “the Garden of Paradise and, indeed, heaven itself is once again accessible to man” and that “the sword of flame no longer prevents his approach.” ...

³⁷ It is interesting that the narrative describes the ‘event’ of crossing in terms of the plural נפלאות.

³⁸ Whatever historical events do or do not lie behind the narrative; cf. the discussion of testimony in chapter 3.

³⁹ I think that this refers to the exodus however.

⁴⁰ W.A. Brueggemann, Theology of The Old Testament: Testimony, Dispute, Advocacy (Minneapolis: Fortress Press, 1997), pp.126-128. cf. also Fishbane’s comments on the exodus-conquest ‘typology’ discussed earlier.

Again, the Jordan is considered as a figure of Baptism in the traditional way, as for example, by reference to the cure of Naaman the leper, or to the entrance of the Jews into the Promised Land.

Cross the Jordan, [he says,] hasten towards the new life in Christ, to the land that bears fruit in happiness, flowing with milk and honey according to the promise. Overthrow Jericho, your former way of life! ... All these things are figures of the reality which is now made manifest.

[Against those who put off Baptism (PG 46.421A)]

But what is original with Gregory is the linking of the Jordan with the Garden of Eden. Taking up an idea which seems to have been first developed by the Gnostics, Gregory contrasts the rivers that flow down from Paradise with the Jordan, which flows back to heaven and has its source in Christ.

Hurry to my Jordan, not at the call of John, but at the command of Christ. For the river of grace does not rise in Palestine and flow into the nearby sea, but flows everywhere, circling the entire world, and empties into Paradise. For it flows in a different direction from those four streams which flow from Eden and bears a cargo much more precious than that which was borne out by them. ... For it brings back those who have been reborn by the Spirit.

[Against those who put off Baptism (PG 46.420C)]

The true Jordan that covers the entire world is the water of Baptism, consecrated by the Baptism of Christ, and it grows into an immense stream which carries men back to Paradise.⁴¹

This kind of association is, perhaps, nothing other than a development of what we find at Qumran. Indeed, Brownlee suggests that

John's baptisms in the Jordan may also owe something to Qumrân. He was awaiting there the coming of a messiah, one mightier than he, who would judge as with fire all moral vipers and usher in the Kingdom of God. His insistence that the rite of baptism meant nothing except as people brought forth fruits worthy of repentance agrees precisely with the emphasis of IQS iii,3-12, which declares that apart from an inner, spiritual cleansing, one remains a moral leper, to be called 'unclean, unclean'. Like the Essenes, John was "preparing the way of the Lord in the wilderness". ... Crossing of the Jordan was also reminiscent of crossing the Red Sea (Josh. 4:23f.; Pss. 66:6; 114:3,5). Hence baptism in the Jordan could suggest baptism in the Sea (1 Cor. 10:2).⁴²

In other words, 'crossing the Jordan' is indeed symbolic for 'crossing into the covenant or community or perhaps life'.⁴³

Perhaps the reason why (Christian) allegorical or typological interpretation such as this has come to be seen as problematic is that it often seeks to present itself as being the 'real metaphysical meaning' of a text, being in some sense an 'exegesis' of it, perhaps evacuating the original story of Joshua of significance in its own right.⁴⁴ However, the 'mythical approach' does not make this move. Rather, used 'as myth' the Jordan crossing functions as a symbol whose significance in the story can be recaptured imaginatively in later contexts to interpret future instances of God action in bringing into life. To evoke ⁴¹ J. Daniélou, From Glory to Glory: Texts from Gregory of Nyssa's mystical writings (London: John Murray, ET:1962), pp.19-21.

⁴² Brownlee, 'Ceremony', p.302.

⁴³ 'Crossing the Jordan' is an important motif in John's gospel (1:28; 3:26 & 10:40), but I argue elsewhere (forthcoming) that John in fact inverts the traditional symbol so that life in Christ is found by crossing out of the land..

⁴⁴ Cf. J.D. Dawson, Christian Figural Reading and the Fashioning of Identity (Berkeley: University of California Press, 2002) for discussion of various modes of typological, allegorical and figural reading.

the image is to evoke all this power of God as wondrously acting. God's continual action of recreating people into communities that anticipates life in its fullness continues to testify to the story of the Jordan crossing, with the Jordan crossing an imaginatively rich way of describing it. And this is simply the continuation of the process that Joshua represents, using the exodus crossing as an imaginative way to say something similar but new about God's action amid his people in a new context. Perhaps the Jordan crossing might be described as a 'limit-situation' symbolically reflecting, toward the extreme, how one might construe divine action in the world and talk about it imaginatively.

However, the kind of Christian reading just outlined will need development so that the reader is drawn more fully into the world that the book portrays, i.e. to see what the fullness of life that is entered into looks like, and I suggest that Joshua is concerned with some aspects of this, as I shall develop. But a more recent example of this imaginative interpretation worked out in a 'performative' context is the final verse of John Hughes' 'Guide me, O thou great Redeemer':

When I tread the verge of Jordan,
 Bid my anxious fears subside;
 Death of Death, and hell's Destruction
 Land me safe on Canaan's side:
 Songs of praises I will ever give to thee.

8.4 Josh. 5:1-12

Josh. 5 continues the story of Israel's journey into the land. There is further development in the locals' response as in Josh. 2, where their hearts are said to melt in fear. The crossing of the Jordan is alluded to, reflecting the development of 4:24. Interestingly, there is no חרם here. This, coupled with the observation that Josh. 5 is concerned with circumcision, Passover and eating from the land suggests that concerns of conquest are not really in view here, with Josh. 5 starting to indicate what 'new life' will look like, with the continued use of עבר inviting further reflection on this 'crossing' into new life, and the creation of a new people. Circumcision follows immediately from the crossing and symbolically verifies this transformation, reflecting the fulfilment of the ancestral promises, and emphasizes the centrality of circumcision in the construction of Israel's identity.⁴⁵ YHWH is faithful in bringing the people into the land, and Israel is faithful in an act that expresses the devotion of their ancestors. Moreover the repetition of יצא (5x) to designate the previous generation contrasts with the current generation of those who have עבר (crossed) into the land.⁴⁶

There are exegetical difficulties in Josh. 5:1-12 that relate to the significant textual problems here. For example, commentators continue to discuss the question of what the 'disgrace of Egypt' refers to, the most likely candidates being a reference to slavery in Egypt or a failure to circumcise the exodus generation.⁴⁷ However, it does seem that the MT represents a redaction of an earlier text that is reflected in the OG that was designed to improve the 'logic and orthodoxy' of the passage, here and in relation to the Passover, as briefly discussed in chapter 7. But as I noted in chapter 7, the original version need not be the preferred version, and so there are numerous difficulties here. All I wish to claim is that the circumcision and Passover (and torah if we take 4QJosh^a's placement of 8:30-35 (MT) here) are significant 'pillars' upon which the new life of Israel in the land are to be founded, demonstrating continuity with Genesis-Exodus, as well as the foundation of identity and existence in the new land, a new phase of Israel's life, as a unified people. For this reason, I am inclined to think that 4QJosh^a's placement of 8:30-35 is, perhaps, the preferred location on the basis of a sensitivity to what Joshua is seeking to achieve here, whether or not it is the original location.⁴⁸ However, Josh. 5:1-12 is concerned specifically with the content of the new life of Israel, and thus one might not expect to

⁴⁵ Placing the ceremony of 8:30-35 (MT) here in 4QJosh^a (cf. chapter 7) makes good sense, for it draws the importance of torah into the construction of Israel's identity at this key prototypical moment.

⁴⁶ Hawk, Joshua, pp.77-80. There are a number of word-plays here, as elsewhere in Joshua. The root עבר is 'played with' in vv.10-12 where we find בערב, בערבות, and מעבור ('in the evening', 'on the plains' and 'produce').

⁴⁷ See e.g. Nelson, Joshua, p.76. How one understands this depends partly upon how one construes the history of the text.

⁴⁸ Cf. A. Rofé who notes that both 'the Mishna and Tosephta establish that the rites mentioned in Josh. 8:30-35 were performed immediately after the crossing of the Jordan [M. Soṭah 7.5; t. Soṭah 8.7].' ('The Editing of the Book of Joshua in the light of 4QJosh^a', in G.J. Brooke (ed.), New Qumran Texts and Studies: Proceedings of the first Meeting of the International Organization for Qumran Studies, Paris, 1992 (Leiden: E.J. Brill, 1994), pp.73-80, here p.79).

find much Christian significance at the narrative level, for Israel's construction of identity here is expressive of elements anchored in the Old Covenant.⁴⁹

One aspect of the story as it relates to the kind of fullness of life that is to be entered into here does find enduring significance – that of God's provision of food, and the way that one is invited to interpret it. The word אכל 'eat' is pivotal, used 3x here, and Nelson suggests that here to eat the yield of Canaan is to claim the land; Israel does not have to wait for the completion of the conquest, for the gifts of the land are already available.⁵⁰ Brueggemann notes that

The food does not need to appear surprisingly. It rises up from the land as gift. ... The old land that Israel remembered so well, the land of slavery, even of banishment, was land by effort. And it was therefore precarious, requiring effort and attention. It was demanding land. The new land, the land given beyond the Jordan, the land of restoration, is land by graciousness.⁵¹

Thus Josh. 5:10-12 makes the association explicit between YHWH's gracious, miraculous provision of manna, and his provision of food in the land. The only difference is the method by which he provides, encouraging one to view food as a gift given through divine action, just like manna. Moreover, אכל is an important term in Lev. 26 in the context of rewards for Israel for obedience and punishment for disobedience. Perhaps in Lev. 26 the nature of Israel's eating symbolizes the nature of reward or punishment with it being symbolic in relation to the covenant. Thus the 'eating' of Josh. 5 reflects a symbolic foundation of Israel's covenantal life, indicating blessed existence with YHWH in the land.

Origen develops the issue of food in a slightly different direction. He suggests that

Three kinds of food ... are described. The first one we certainly enjoy when going out of the land of Egypt ... Manna follows after this. But the third fruit we receive now from the holy land. ... But, placed in the desert, that is, the condition of life in which we now are, we enjoy the manna only through what we learn by the instructions of the divine law.⁵²

⁴⁹ However, the significance of the Passover is developed in a Christian context, but it is difficult to relate this directly to the narrative here, other than to say that the Last Supper is in a sense foundational to Christian identity in the way that Passover is to Israelite identity. Indeed, this is the kind of way that the story does find significance in the Christian tradition. But Origen does develop the narrative, noting that circumcision occurs before Passover, implying that nobody unclean may celebrate the Passover, which he then interprets in terms of receiving communion (Hom. Josh. 6.1, p.68).

⁵⁰ Nelson, Joshua, pp.78-80.

⁵¹ W. Brueggemann, The Land: Place as Gift, Promise and Challenge in Biblical Faith (Overtures to Biblical Theology) (Minneapolis: Fortress Press, 2nd ed. 2002), pp.47-48.

⁵² Hom. Josh. 6.1, p.69.

Thus Origen uses the exodus-wilderness-conquest cycle as a map for the Christian life, existentially interpreting the earthly Christian life as life in the wilderness being taught through divine instruction. What is interesting is that this sort of reading reflects a sensitivity to the idea of liminality that we briefly considered in chapter 2 through Victor Turner's work, something that I shall now develop. Together with the crossing of the Jordan as something of a recapitulation of the exodus crossing, the cessation of the manna upon the harvest from the land creates a certain symmetry of the 'conquest' with the exodus. Israel's life in the wilderness is now over as she enters the land, with a new status. Read canonically the exodus and 'conquest' reflect a transition, rather like a 'rite of passage', but of a whole community, Israel, from slavery to new life. The first major study of rites of passage was Arnold van Gennep's (1909), whose work has been developed by Victor Turner, as we noted in chapter 2. Van Gennep argued that beneath the diversity of human ritual there was a basic threefold scheme of phases of separation, segregation and incorporation (or pre-liminal, liminal and post-liminal phases). In the first phase (separation), people are separated from their former status and way of life in order to enter the second phase of seclusion during which time truths, values and new commitments are taught, before being incorporated into their new social status in the third phase.⁵³ Edmund Leach analyzes aspects of the exodus-conquest in terms of this model;⁵⁴ the Israelites journey to a land flowing with milk and honey from Egypt, a land of suffering, through the wilderness, a place of potential starvation and death, but a place where God is encountered in extraordinary ways, making it a liminal site. He suggests that

The prototype Wilderness is provided by the geographic environment of the wanderings in the Book of Exodus. If you are in Egypt, the Wilderness is where you get to if you cross the Red Sea; if you are in the land of Israel, the Wilderness is where you get to if you cross the Jordan. The Wilderness is the Other World. Entering or leaving the Wilderness symbolizes a metaphysical movement from the here and now to the timelessness of the Other or vice versa. ...

In this Other World everything happens in reverse. The heavenly bread falls from the sky like rain; the heavenly water does not fall like rain but emerges from a rock. Perhaps you think this polarity is a structuralist fantasy? On the contrary, the point is noted in the Talmud.

The end of the forty-year period of wandering in the Wilderness presents exactly the same set of motifs but in a different order: in Joshua 3-4 the Israelites cross the Jordan on dry land; in Joshua 5:2-9 there is a renewal of the rite of circumcision, which had been omitted during the wanderings in the Wilderness; at verse 10 the Israelites celebrate the Passover; at verse 12 the daily supply of ⁵³ D.J. Davies, Anthropology and Theology (Oxford: Berg, 2002), p.123.

⁵⁴ E. Leach, 'Fishing for Men on the Edge of the Wilderness' in R. Alter & F. Kermode, The Complete Literary Guide to the Bible (Cambridge: Harvard UP, 1987), pp.579-599, esp. pp.584-589.

manna ceases; in Joshua 6 the enemy (in this case the people of Jericho) are destroyed by divine intervention.

This symmetry cannot be accidental. The Wilderness is marked off as altogether Other. It is a world in which ordinary food is not available but in which God's chosen people are sustained with divine bread and divine water. It is a world in which the chosen prophets Moses and Joshua, and to a lesser extent Aaron and Miriam, converse directly with God. It is a world in which the rite of circumcision is not required (apart from the enigmatic exception of Gershom). It is a world with sharply defined water boundaries: the Red Sea on one side, the river Jordan on the other. In order to enter this sacred other world, ordinary people (other than chosen prophets such as Moses and Aaron) need divine intervention by which the water boundaries are made passable. It is a world which includes the mountain of God, Mount Sinai (Horeb), which is itself bounded, a world apart within a world apart (Exod. 19:12, 23-24).

Thus specified, the Wilderness, the Other World of things sacred, is in every respect the exact converse of the profane world that is familiar to ordinary people conducting their ordinary secular affairs.⁵⁵

Thus it is possible to read the exodus-conquest as a 'rite of passage' for Israel, which is reinterpreted in terms of the Christian life in a Christian context, in which she is 'separated' from her former state of slavery in Egypt (life under the power of sin) before being 'reincorporated' into the fullness of life in the land flowing with milk and honey (future life with God) after being 'segregated' for a period of divine instruction in which the law is given (the Christian life now). Existentially then, the community, or the reader, is invited to interpret their life as a transition from a state of slavery and bondage into the fullness of life, via the wilderness, which is a 'dangerous place' which has the quality of two different spheres of existence (earthly and heavenly perhaps) in which one is detached from one's former way of life and given divine instruction, being 'supernaturally' sustained. It is a place of possibility and transformation, and a powerful symbol for the Christian life. In a sense the wilderness is a 'limit-situation', for it forms the contours for a detachment from the 'everyday' into a world in which the divine is most clearly manifested, and is thus not part of everyday experience as such; rather, one is invited to interpret the reality of the 'ordinary' in these terms. Moreover, liminal sites are characterized by a stripping of normal statuses and roles, and this is something that is reflected in the Christian life (e.g. Gal. 3:28). The Christian life is a journey lived in the wilderness. In summary then, we see again that an anthropological perspective is able to make traditional Christian reading and use of the text intelligible, indicating that it does, in fact, demonstrate a sensitivity to what the text reflects, even if it is not 'exegesis' per se.

⁵⁵ Ibid, pp.586-587.

8.5 Josh. 5:13-15

Josh. 5:13-15 describes the appearance of a divine messenger to Joshua, a report that Nelson describes as a 'stunted, cryptic narrative [that] seems to break off before any real plot has a chance to develop and twists into a jarring ending that connects only ambiguously with the following story'.⁵⁶ Likewise Hawk suggests that it certainly 'halts the forward momentum' of the plot in Joshua, where one has an expectation of a better ending, especially when compared with Ex. 3.⁵⁷ Thus it is commonly supposed that the original ending of the story has been lost, with the real message of the commander now missing,⁵⁸ granted the jarring ending that the story now has. However, it is significant that despite this roughness no attempt has been made to smooth it through redaction, with no textual witness to a longer form. Moreover, even if it had a 'satisfactory ending' that has been lost, the story would, probably, still be rather cryptic granted the nature of the figure appearing to Joshua and the response given to Joshua's question – it is an ambiguous response.

Indeed, there are various difficulties with the interpretation of this account. It is not clear whether to read בִּירִיחוֹ (5:13) as 'in Jericho' or 'near Jericho'.⁵⁹ Moreover, it is difficult to know what the significance of the drawn sword is. Other biblical examples would imply a message of judgement or warning, (cf. Num. 22:21-35 & 1 Ch. 21:14-16), whereas in the ANE context, in the Annals of Assurbanipal for example, Ishtar appears with a drawn sword to give a promise in a battle, and thus the drawn sword functions as a sign of encouragement.⁶⁰ This seems to point to an inherent ambiguity that is accentuated through the dialogue between Joshua and the mysterious commander. Joshua asks,

הלנו אתה אם-לצרינו

⁵⁶ Nelson, Joshua, p.80.

⁵⁷ Hawk, Joshua, p.83-85. It is worth pointing out that Ex.3 is also assumed to read roughly owing to the history of the text, in particular the sign of 3:12 is difficult (see B.S. Childs, Exodus (OTL) (London: SCM, 1974), pp.56-60. Perhaps then there is something that is often ambiguous and elusive about such narratives?

⁵⁸ e.g. P.D. Miller, The Divine Warrior in early Israel (Harvard Semitic Monographs 5) (Cambridge MA: Harvard UP, 1973), p.129.

⁵⁹ Nelson reads 'by Jericho' (Joshua, pp.73, 80-81) whilst Butler reads 'in Jericho' (Joshua, p.54).

⁶⁰ ANET, p.451. cf. J. van Seters, 'Joshua's Campaign of Canaan and Near Eastern Historiography', in SJOT 4 (1990), pp.1-12.

(‘Are you for us or for our adversaries?’) to which the commander replies,

לֹא כִי אֲנִי שֶׁר־צְבֹא־יְהוָה עָתָה בָּאתִי

(‘Neither. For I am the commander of the army of YHWH. Now I have come.’)

The phrase שֶׁר־צְבֹא־יְהוָה certainly locates the story in a context of warfare. But the response is unexpected; one would expect to find the commander on Israel’s side, or at the very least on one side or the other. So, as Robert Polzin puts it, ‘The situation is much more complex than the familiar answer of an authoritarian dogmatism would have it: “God is on our side; we have the promise made to our fathers, and the law given to Moses!” The commander’s answer is not so clear cut.’⁶¹ This suggests once again that Joshua is not, in any straightforward sense, simply a story of conquest, even if it uses the discourse of conquest

Read in its current form, the encounter might be understood as anticipating the ambiguity of the question of whether ‘God is on Israel’s side’ by introducing the stories of Jericho and Ai (and indeed the whole ‘conquest’), reflecting the stories of Rahab and Achan. God is neither straightforwardly for Israel (i.e., for Israel on Israel’s terms) nor straightforwardly against her enemies. Rather, as seen in the stories of Rahab and Achan, what matters is whether one aligns oneself with YHWH; the right question is to ask whether one is ‘for YHWH’ or not, and not the other way around. Thus the question that arises for the reader is not that of asking whether God is ‘on my/our side’, or a matter of trying to ‘co-opt’ God onto ‘my/our side’, but of asking whether I/we have ‘aligned’ myself/ourselves with God. As we shall see, 5:13-15 functions in its present form as an important interpretative key that introduces the material that follows, with the story encouraging reflection on three perspectives; one’s own, one’s adversaries, and God’s. Josh. 5:13-15 resists the collapsing of these three perspectives into two, which is what so often happens; there is ‘us’ and ‘them’, and God is (usually) on ‘our’ side. The text thus refuses ‘colonial’ categories.

⁶¹ Polzin, Moses, p.112.

8.6 Josh. 6

Josh. 6, which narrates the fall of Jericho, is an unusual story. There is no other account quite like it in the Old Testament, or in extant ANE texts. The story resolves Rahab's story and introduces Achan's, being two important, contrasting, symbolic characters whose stories intersect at a symbolic city. Indeed, Jericho, and its capture, symbolizes the 'conquest' and its nature perhaps; Jericho represents a terrifying, large fortified city (cf. Num. 13:28; Deut. 9:1ff), which would explain why Jericho is singled out. Coogan suggests that Jericho was well fortified from the Neolithic period onwards, with its fortifications being anomalous owing to their grand scale, which may have given rise to a folk-tradition about the city;⁶² in other words, it had a cultural reputation. Nelson suggests that

Jericho is unique, however, because it serves as a paradigm for the entire conquest. Not only is Jericho Israel's first conquest, it is the gateway to Canaan, near a natural crossing point (4:19; 2 Sam. 10:5). The language of the Rahab story has already prepared the reader to equate Jericho with the land as a whole (2:1, 2, 9, 14, 18, 24). A second unusual feature is the secondary and unwarlike part played by Israel's fighters until trumpet and shout trigger the attack and slaughter. Israel engages in a symbolic, ritualistic siege of the city. Trumpets are detached from their battle situation (such as Judg. 7:15-22) and take on a liturgical flavor (as, e.g., Ps. 98:6). The war cry (Jer. 20:16) merges into a shout of cultic joy (1 Sam. 4:5-6). The seven-day timetable is of greater importance than maneuvers on the ground (contrast 8:3-22; 10:9-11; 11:7-8). For this reason the narrative problem is not really the size and extent of the enemy forces (as in 10:3-6; 11:1-5), but that Jericho is tightly closed up behind impregnable walls (v.1). Spectacular divine intervention resolves this problem when the wall collapses (literally "falls down in its place").⁶³

So whilst Jericho reflects the Israelites' fear that the land is impregnable (cf. Num. 13), Josh. 6 indicates that the 'conquest' will nonetheless occur, with divine aid. Indeed, the narrative commences with the cue that God has given (נָתַן) the city to the Israelites, reiterated in Joshua's speech (6:16), reflecting Josh. 1. The king of Jericho is un-named, enhancing the narrative's symbolic nature, which, coupled with the lack of explicit 'military' detail, and the small amount of narrative space given to reporting destruction and battle suggests that Josh. 6 does not function as a military 'conquest account'. Indeed, 86 words are devoted to Rahab and 102 the destruction of Jericho, showing the importance of Rahab's rescue for this story.⁶⁴

⁶² M.D. Coogan, 'Archaeology and Biblical Studies: The Book of Joshua', in W.H. Propp et al (eds), The Hebrew Bible and its Interpreters (Winona Lake: Eisenbrauns, 1990), pp.19-32, here p.22.

⁶³ Nelson, Joshua, p.91.

⁶⁴ R.S. Hess, Joshua (TOTC) (Leicester: IVP, 1996), pp.133-134.

What is the significance of the unusual procession? Fleming suggests that the siege of Jericho is transformed into a ritual procession by the ark and ‘with a play on the common idea of siege as encirclement, where fixed encirclement becomes circumambulation (verbs סבב and נקף).’⁶⁵ He goes on to consider Josh. 6 in light of the Keret Epic (KTU 1.14). In the Keret Epic Keret is addressed in a dream by El to set out on a seven day march towards Udm (iii.2-10). Upon reaching Udm, rather than attacking, the army must remain silent (dm) for six days (iii.11-13) in contrast to normal siege procedure (iii.14-15). By the seventh day Pbl the king of Udm will be unable to sleep (iii.16-20) – a common expression of anxiety. Thus there are two seven-day periods ‘to immerse Keret’s mission in sacred time. By operating in seven-day intervals, Keret moves in synchronicity with El in heaven.’ Fleming notes that although the number seven is widely used at Ugarit, the seven day period in Ugaritic texts ‘applies more specifically to activity touching the divine sphere’ (e.g. KTU 1.4.vi.24-33; 1.17.i.2-16, ii.30-40; 1.22.i.21-26), and so he suggests that ‘Repetition of the period in the Keret episode shows that the seven days ultimately belong not to siege as such but to intervals of activity under divine supervision and power.’ Thus Fleming concludes that there is no need to see a hypothetical festival as the basis of the campaign, and thus ‘In light of Keret, the seven days of the Jericho siege need not be attributed to a re-enacted festival drama but naturally belong to a narration about warfare by divine plan.’⁶⁶

Hawk notes that יובל (‘ram’s horn’, Josh. 6:4, 5, 6, 8, 13) occurs elsewhere in the sense of ‘ram’s horn’ only in Ex. 19:13 in connection with Sinai, although it occurs elsewhere in the sense of ‘Jubilee’ (Lev. 25; 27; Num. 36:4). In Lev. 25:8-55 the trumpet sound inaugurates the Jubilee after ‘seven sabbaths of years, seven years, seven times’ (25:8). But Hawk notes that there is a similar repetition of sevens in Josh. 6; march for seven days, and seven times on the seventh day, suggesting that the concern of both texts is the transfer of property and possession of land. The Jubilee calls for the return of all land to its rightful owners and provides guidelines for the redemption and release of property

⁶⁵ D.E. Fleming, ‘The Seven-Day Siege of Jericho in Holy War’ in R. Chazan (et al) (eds), Ki Baruch Hu: Ancient Near Eastern, Biblical and Judaic Studies in honour of Baruch A. Levine (Winona Lake: Eisenbrauns, 1999), pp.211-228, here p.218.

⁶⁶ Ibid, pp.221-223.

(Lev. 25:10, 25-34). Thus Hawk detects an allusion to the Jubilee here, with the fall of Jericho being like a Jubilee - the land is returned to its owner and Israel is given occupancy (cf. Gen.12:7; 15:18-21; 17:8; Ex.3:8, etc.). Moreover, he notes that YHWH has redeemed Israel from Egypt to become a people of his own possession (Deut. 4:20, cf. 7:8), and that a significant part of the Jubilee legislation concerns the redemption of slaves (Lev. 25:39-55), a practice explicitly associated with YHWH bringing Israel out of Egypt and into Canaan.⁶⁷ Thus one might interpret the 'conquest' using the concept of Jubilee, and indeed given that Josh. 6 follows almost immediately from the 'festal' material in Josh. 5, this has attractions.⁶⁸ In other words, the land is not being 'stolen'; rather the divine owner of the land is giving occupancy to its rightful grantees.⁶⁹

The חרם command here is extreme; everything is to be destroyed. But I suggest that the חרם functions here as a 'limit-situation' that is required to serve narrative and structural requirements that relate, primarily, to the resolution of Rahab's story and to the introduction of Achan's story - without extreme חרם the stories of Rahab and Achan would not exist as Rahab might have survived anyway and Achan might not have committed an offence. Rather, the extreme חרם enables the narrator to tell these stories, in stylized form that take their inspiration from other stories of conquest, that indicate that Israel's identity is, in fact, based upon doing חסד (Rahab), symbolizing the heart of the covenant, and avoiding חמור (Achan) (symbolizing disobedience to the covenant). It seems to relate only secondarily to the annihilation of idolatry and sources of it when read through Deut. 7.

⁶⁷ Hawk, Joshua, pp.94-95.

⁶⁸ If one wishes to claim that this is more than an intertextual reading (which I think that it is), then the difficult question of the relative dating of the texts is raised, or rather of the story in Josh. 6 and the Jubilee concept in the sort of form that one finds it in Leviticus. But if much of 6:3-6 does reflect an 'MT revision' of an earlier text (cf. Nelson, Joshua, pp.83-84), then the importance of the sevens is stressed by this move, perhaps drawing the story into closer proximity with the Jubilee concept.

⁶⁹ The association with Lev. 25 might be strengthened in the light of the association of the ideas in Josh. 5 with Lev. 26. Prof. E.F. Davis suggested to me that 'Leviticus 26 might be seen as depicting the un-Jubilee, when the connection between Israel's eating and the land is broken.' Indeed, perhaps the references to cities being laid waste here (e.g. 26:31, 33) has resonances with the destruction of Jericho in Josh. 6.

I argued in chapter 6 that 6:19 & 24 were later glosses arising from the development of a more priestly conception of חֶרֶם, glosses that have tended to skew the interpretation of Josh. 6-7. Thus in one sense the earlier form of the story (without 6:19 & 24) might be said to have greater theological and ‘revelatory’ significance. But, in another sense, once the basic story is understood, these additions make חֶרֶם an increasingly difficult category by drawing it into the domain of קִדְּשׁ, drawing it further into the divine sphere, which serves to distance חֶרֶם from the ordinary.

After the destruction of Jericho a curse is placed on anyone who tries to rebuild the city, which found its ‘fulfilment’ in 1 Kg. 16:34 when Hiel rebuilt its foundations during the reign of Ahab. Such curses following city destructions are known elsewhere, for example in the Annals of Tiglath-Pileser I:

I overwhelmed the city Hunusu, their stronghold, (so that it looked) like a ruin hill (created by) the Deluge.

Violently I fought with their mighty army in city and mountain. I inflicted on them a decisive defeat. I laid low their men-at-arms in the mountains like sheep. I cut off their heads like sheep.

I made their blood flow into the hollows and plains of the mountains.

(Thus) I conquered that city. I took their gods; (and)

I carried off their booty, possessions (and) property. I burned the city.

The three great walls which were constructed with baked bricks and the entire city I razed (and) destroyed.

I turned (it) into a ruin hill and a heap. I strewed ‘šipu’-stones over it.

I made bronze lightning bolts (and)

I inscribed on them (a description of) the conquest of the lands which by Aššur, my lord, I had conquered, (and) a warning) not to occupy that city and not to rebuild its wall.

On that (site) I built a house of baked brick.

I put inside it those bronze lightning bolts.⁷⁰

Thus as we saw in chapter 5, Joshua uses standard ‘motifs’ in building the story.

Whilst Josh. 6 supplies the resolution of Rahab’s story, the ending retains ambiguity. Rahab and her family are placed outside the camp of Israel (6:23), which may simply reflect the need to undergo purification (cf. Deut. 23:10-15). But Joshua’s speech makes it clear that it is in accordance with the spies’ oath that Rahab is spared (6:22-23), perhaps suggesting a distancing of Joshua from the decision to spare her. Joshua’s only part is to uphold the oath that has been made, presumably reflecting positively on Joshua as one who keeps oaths (cf. Lev. 5:4; 30:2). There is no explicit evaluation supplied, and nothing to indicate that Rahab ‘becomes’ an Israelite, although the final note (6:25) is slightly more positive; Rahab’s family continues to live in the midst of (בְּקֶרֶב) Israel. Moreover, in the light of the significance of נָחַם in Joshua, being the goal of the campaign, the choice of נָחַם rather than some other form of expression in relation to Rahab and her family in 6:23 may be significant, suggesting that Rahab and her family found rest just like the rest that Israel sought, rest that she found in the midst of Israel. In other words, the narrator implies in every way that Rahab becomes part of Israel, and is characterized as an Israelite, although without saying so explicitly. Perhaps this is left for the reader to decide, which suggests that Deut. 7 needs careful handling.

⁷⁰ Aššur Prism V.99 – VI.21, in ACA, pp.80-81.

Turning to the Christian reception of Josh. 6, Origen offers an imaginative retelling of the story in a new context, through juxtaposition with ‘new myths’:

Jericho is surrounded; it must be captured. How, therefore, is Jericho captured? The sword is not drawn against it; the battering ram is not arranged, nor is the spear hurled. The priestly trumpets alone are employed, and by these the walls of Jericho are overthrown.

We frequently find Jericho to be placed in Scripture as a figure of this world. ...

Consequently, this Jericho (that is, this world) is about to fall; for indeed the consummation of the age has already been made known a little while ago by the sacred books. In what way, therefore, will the consummation be given to it? By what instruments? By the sound, it says, of trumpets. Of what trumpets? Let Paul make known the mystery of this secret to you. Hear what he himself says: “The trumpet will sound,” he says, “and the dead who are in Christ will rise incorruptible,” and, “The Lord himself with a command, with the voice of the archangel and with the trumpet of God, will descend from heaven.” At that time, therefore, Jesus our Lord conquers Jericho with trumpets and overthrows it, so that out of it, only the prostitute is saved and all her house.

Therefore, our Lord Jesus will come and he will come with the sound of trumpets. But just now let us pray that he may come and destroy “the world that lay in wickedness” and all things that are in the world, because “everything that is in the world is the lust of the flesh and the lust of the eyes.” May he destroy that, may he dissolve it again and again, and save only this one who received his spies and who placed his apostles, received with faith and obedience, in the high places. And may he join and unite this prostitute with the house of Israel.⁷¹

Here, Origen interprets Josh. 6 through its cultural and canonical context in which Jericho, and its inhabitants, symbolize evil that is to be overthrown (e.g. Deut. 7 & 9:4-5), and develops the significance of this in a later context – it is an exploration of the plenitude of the symbol as appropriated in another context, drawing upon the symbolic significance of Jericho as outlined by Nelson above. Regarding Rahab, whilst Theodoret of Cyrus offers a more ‘historicizing’ reading than Origen does,⁷² his reading of Rahab’s story is similar to Origen’s in which Rahab, and her house, is a type for the church.⁷³ Indeed, Rahab being a type for the church appears to be the ‘centre of gravity’ for Christian interpretation of the story.⁷⁴ In the New Testament however, she is a paragon of faith (Heb. 11:31), and for the necessity for faith to be accompanied by works (Jas. 2:25).⁷⁵ These two aspects, her ‘faith’ and her ‘works’ are differently developed and emphasized in the tradition. For Cyril of Jerusalem she is ‘saved through repentance’,⁷⁶ and ‘saved ... when she believed’.⁷⁷ Similarly, Calvin stresses her faith; ‘What seed of righteousness was in Rahab ... before she had faith?’⁷⁸ Alternatively, Gregory of Nazianzus neglects her faith and stresses her hospitality; ‘Rahab the harlot was justified by one thing alone, her hospitality’,⁷⁹ although in 1 Clem. 12 both are held together; ‘for her faith and hospitality Rahab the harlot was saved’.⁸⁰ However, there is no indication of repentance in Josh. 2, and it is her ῥῶτις that the narrative emphasizes, even though, from a later perspective ‘faith’ might be an appropriate way of describing her response too, reflecting a fitting development of the story, and it seems that both of these aspects should be held together in the Christian interpretation of the story. I shall return to this in chapter 9.

⁷¹ Hom. Josh. 6.4, pp.71-73.

But is the focus of Rahab’s story conversion as such? A neo-structuralist reading of the Old Testament suggests that in the structural system that it reflects it was not possible for a non-Israelite to ‘convert’ to Israel, for Israel’s identity was genealogically constructed, ⁷² Quest. Josh. 7, p.281.

⁷³ Origen, Hom. Josh. 3.5, pp.49-50; cf. Theodoret of Cyrus, Quest. Josh. 2.2 ‘No one should imagine that Rahab was unworthy of being a type [τὸν τύπον] of the Church’, (p.267).

⁷⁴ E.g. Chrysostom (Homilies on Repentance and Almsgiving 7.5.16, in ACCS, p.12); Cyprian (Letter 69.4 in ACCS, p.14); Jerome (Homily on Exodus 91, in ACCS, p.40).

⁷⁵ Moreover, in chapter 9 I shall consider resonances of Rahab in Matthew’s gospel, e.g. Matt. 15:21-28.

⁷⁶ Catechetical Lectures 2.9, in ACCS, p.12.

⁷⁷ Lecture 10.11, in NPNF II.7, p.201.

⁷⁸ Inst III.24.11, p.978. Cf. Joshua, p.46, in which Rahab is said to ‘pass by faith to a new people’. Interestingly, whilst he cites Jas. 2:25 here, he uses it to emphasize only her faith, which runs against James’ use of Rahab’s story.

⁷⁹ Theological Oration 40.19, in NPNF II.7, p.695. Cf. Oration 14.2 – whilst Abraham is an example of faith, and justified by faith, Rahab is praised and spared for her hospitality (in B.E. Daley, Gregory of Nazianzus (The Early Church Fathers) (Routledge, New ed.: 2000), p.76).

⁸⁰ 1 Clem. 12, in ACCS, p.12.

something demonstrated in the patriarchal narratives,⁸¹ with Rahab, Naaman and Ruth, for example, reflecting notable exceptions are the exception rather than the rule – other examples include Naaman and Ruth.⁸² So Rahab's story is an instance of a 'pushing' of the Israelite worldview, and Deuteronomy's theology and outlook in particular, which might explain why the ending retains a note of ambiguity – it is good rhetoric. Here is someone who 'looks like' the parade example of the outsider, but acts like the model Israelite, with her prostitution, and perhaps her act of deception, as deception per se, being understood as literary features that are required at the narrative level to make the story 'work' in surprising and interesting ways. And this 'pushing' worked, in the Christian tradition as we have seen, but also in the Jewish tradition, for Rahab is a proselyte who marries Joshua (Megilah 14b), saves herself and those with her by her merit, attaching herself to Israel, and is an ancestor of a number of prophets, including Jeremiah, (Ruth Rabbah 2.1).⁸³ This is 'conversion' in Jewish categories; incorporation into Israel's genealogy, and having important descendants who are characterized as true Israelites. Thus whether or not 'conversion' is an appropriate category to describe Rahab's story as originally construed, the story is read in a 'fitting' way in the tradition(s) of its use in this way, developing what is there is the story.

8.7 Josh. 7:1-8:29

Josh. 7-8 develops the story of Achan introduced in Josh. 6, in which Achan withheld some of the חָרָם, through an attack on Ai. Indeed, the narrator supplies an 'interpretative key' at the beginning of the story (7:1), with the failure of the attack on Ai being interpreted in advance. The attack fails because Israel 'violated' (מָעַל) the חָרָם, although it is interesting that Achan's violation is interpreted as being Israel's.

⁸¹ See S.D. Kunin, We Think What We Eat: Neo-structuralist analysis of Israelite Food Rules and Other Cultural and Textual Practices (JSOTSup 412), (London: T&T Clark, 2004), e.g. p.138.

⁸² Christian readers may find it strange that stories such as Ruth and Rahab's are the exception to the rule, and would probably have been rather shocking originally, precisely because these stories sought to 'push' Israelite ideology into a direction that sits well with a Christian structure and ideology. These stories thus gain prominence and are taken as the norm rather than the exception in Christian reading.

⁸³ Also see Num. Rab. 8.9, Cant. Rab. 1.22; 6.10, Eccl. Rab. 5.13; 8:13.

The story commences with the ‘literary device’ of a spy mission (cf. Josh. 2) in which the spies sent return confidently with the result that a small force is sent to conquer Ai. Notably there is no mention of YHWH or of inquiring his instructions here. What follows reflects a number of ironic reversals of the spy mission in Num. 13. In Num. 13 the spies, sent at YHWH’s command, were terrified and returned pessimistically, with the result that no conquest was attempted when it could have been successfully conducted, whereas here the spies go at Joshua’s rather than YHWH’s command and return confidently, with the result that an assault is attempted, but ends in failure. Ironic here is that Ai, if it means ‘ruin’, contrasts with the well-fortified, impregnable Jericho which fell so easily, for now Israel is defeated by a ‘ruin’. Moreover, it is ironic that here the hearts of the Israelites ‘melt’ (7:5), like the hearts of the locals had previously (2:11; 5:1), although here an extra clause, is added for emphasis. Moreover, this fear is the result of a small loss, only thirty-six troops, adding to the irony and sense of panic. Furthermore the Israelites were pursued as far as Shebarim (destruction) (7:5), suggesting that geography serves a symbolic function here. In another ironic reversal, whilst in Josh. 6 it was Israel that surrounded (סבב) Jericho, now Joshua fears that the Canaanites will סבב Israel (7:9). But the narrator also uses a ‘type scene’ in a rather ambiguous way; Joshua’s response to the defeat (7:6-9) reflects the complaint of the Israelites wandering in the desert, a complaint that demonstrated their unfaithfulness (Ex. 16:3; 17:3; Num. 14:2-3). Why is Joshua, who is portrayed so positively generally, cast as responding like unfaithful, grumbling Israel? It seems to serve two functions. First, to add to the sense of panic and despair, and secondly, whereas previously the complaint expressed a desire to return to Egypt from the wilderness, here it expresses a desire to return to the wilderness, outside the promised land, symbolizing the reversal of Israel’s entry into new life. Joshua’s despair is thus used to indicate that Israel’s new status and life hang in the balance.

וימס לבב־העם ויהי למים

As the story unfolds we see that it is largely concerned with the חרם objects that Achan withheld from Jericho. Whilst Jericho brings closure to Rahab’s story, it introduces Achan's story in which he brings trouble to Israel; note the wordplay on עֹכֹר (trouble) (6:18) and the name עֶכָן (Achan),⁸⁴ and the naming of the place, עֶכֹר (Achor), in 7:26. Achan is clearly identified as 'the sinner', confessing his sin (חַטָּא) (7:19-20), but what is difficult to understand is the nature of Achan's response to Joshua.⁸⁵ What would be an adequate response to Joshua's command to give glory to YHWH and make confession to him (7:19)? One feels that Achan's response is inadequate. Whilst it is an adequate 'confession', there is no sense of giving God glory and praise. Perhaps as Achan is already condemned to death (7:15), this inadequate response serves to confirm the validity of the judgment; Achan is not one who glorifies God, indicating something of his character and attitude – he acts as an outsider, even though he is set up as the paradigmatic insider through genealogy, being of the tribe of Judah, a genealogy given twice for emphasis (7:1, 16-18). The seriousness of Achan's crime is emphasized by the repeated use of וַנִּם in 7:11, which, rhetorically, 'piles up' and compounds the number and nature of violations that this single crime represents. Moreover, perhaps נִבְלָה in 7:15 is an ironic pun on נַחֲלָה - rather than helping to bring Israel into her inheritance, Achan has done a 'disgraceful thing' in Israel.⁸⁶ But why is Achan's crime so serious? I suggested in chapter 6 that the violation of the חֶרֶם here symbolises covenant violation. This is how YHWH interprets the violation (עָבְרוּ אֶת־בְּרִיתִי, 7:11), and indeed the use of גָּנַב (steal) in 7:11 reflects the Decalogue's language (Deut. 5:19), as does חָמַד (covet)

⁸⁴ Hawk notes that the name עֶכָן is meaningless, but is essentially an anagram of כְּנָעַן (Canaan) (Joshua, p.120). This might suggest that Achan is essentially a 'hidden' Canaanite.

⁸⁵ Joshua's reference to 'not hiding' here sets up a parallel with Achan's 'hiding' the חֶרֶם in 7:21, although a different root (טָמַן) is used here, probably to set up a parallel with Josh.2:6 to invite the reader to compare and contrast Achan with Rahab.

⁸⁶ Moreover the root עֹכֹר is used in Gen. 34, suggesting that the two stories may be mutually illuminating; this incident is compared with the trouble resulting from Dinah's rape.

in 7:21. But note the use of the root עבר, indicating another boundary crossing, reflecting Achan's transition from insider to outsider, manifested in execution.⁸⁷

Thus Achan's story balances or contrasts Rahab's. Rahab, the outsider, the Canaanite prostitute, gives glory to YHWH in her 'confession' and 'does חסד', symbolizing the heart of the covenant, whilst Achan, the insider, the Israelite of the tribe of Judah, fails to glorify YHWH in his 'confession' and 'does חמד', symbolizing what is antithetical to the covenant. Indeed Rahab is spared because she hid (טמן, 2:6) the spies (מלאכים) whom Joshua sent (6:17), whereas Achan is executed because he hid (טמן, 7:21) the חרם (7:21), discovered by the מלאכים whom Joshua sent (7:22).⁸⁸ One is thus invited to read Achan and Rahab as two contrasting examples that have the extreme חרם of Jericho at their symbolic intersection. What happens to Achan?

Not only is Achan executed, but so are his children, representing the blotting out of his name, reflecting Deut. 29:16-21. Here we find the singling out of the offender (Deut. 29:21), and its language reflects the process of singling the offender out through tribe and clan (29:18) found in Josh. 7. The injunction in Deut. 29 is that the offender's name should be blotted out (29:20) with the curses of Deuteronomy falling on him (29:20-21), reflected in Josh. 7 by the execution of Achan's children. Achan is thus interpreted as a root producing bitter poison (29:18) who is 'high handed' (29:19) and whom YHWH will never forgive (29:20). He is an idolater, who has turned away from YHWH to worship other gods (29:16-18). Thus Achan is cast as an idolater, a true outsider, manifested in the blotting out of his name by the execution of him and his family.

⁸⁷ Moreover, Hess detects a resonance between Achan's story and Eve in the Garden of Eden; Achan sinned when he saw (ראה) something beautiful (טוב) – the same words used in Gen. 3:6 with regard to Eve and the fruit (Joshua, pp.151-152).

⁸⁸ Whilst various words are used for the hiding, the same root (טמן) is used in 7:21 and 2:6 where Rahab's action of hiding is first mentioned.

Thus Achan, and his story, represent a ‘limit-situation’ that reflects the construction of Israel’s identity. Taken together with Rahab’s, the two stories seek to probe the question of what makes a true Israelite. Recalling the discussion on the existential and amoral nature of myth in chapter 2, we may see that we are meant to be shocked by the ethically problematic nature of the story; it is designed to call us up short so that we can see how serious a matter keeping the covenant is. But it also serves important functions from a neo-structuralist perspective, being a ‘limit-situation’ in this regard too, challenging the idea of the genealogical construction of identity in the opposite way to Rahab’s story. The story is only a model to follow for behaviour in as far as it encourages obedience to the covenant and praise of YHWH and the construction of identity in this way; it is not about the execution of innocent children, a narrative device that serves essentially structural requirements relating to the construction of Israel’s identity.

Thus far we have considered the story in essentially deuteronomistic terms, and seen how it is fitting to read the story from this perspective. But granted the use of the (essentially) priestly term מַעַל to interpret Achan’s crime, might the story thus be read well from a priestly perspective?⁸⁹ But what would a ‘priestly perspective’ on Josh.7 be? I would like to start by considering Jacob Milgrom’s analysis of the theologies of P and H. He suggests that,

The most important ideological distinction between P and H rests in their contrasting concepts of holiness. For P, spatial holiness is limited to the sanctuary; for H, it is coextensive with the promised land. Holiness of persons is restricted in P to priests and Nazirites (Num. 6:5–8); H extends it to all Israel. This expansion follows logically from H’s doctrine of spatial holiness: since the land is holy, all who reside in it are to keep it that way. Every adult Israelite is enjoined to attain holiness by observing the Lord’s commandments, and even the gēr, “resident alien,” must heed the prohibitive commandments, for their violation pollutes the land (e.g., Lev. 18:26).

P’s doctrine of holiness is static; H’s is dynamic. On the one hand, P constricts holiness to the sanctuary and its priests. P assiduously avoids the Heb term qādōš, “holy,” even in describing the Levites ... On the other hand, though H concedes that only priests are innately holy (Lev. 21:7), it repeatedly calls upon Israel to strive for holiness. The dynamic quality of H’s concept is highlighted by its resort to the same participial construction Heb mēqaddēš, “sanctifying,” in describing the holiness of both the laity and the priesthood. Sanctification is an ongoing process for priests (Lev. 21:8, 15, 23; 22:9, 16) as well as for all Israelites (Lev. 21:8; 22:32). No different from the Israelites, the priests bear a holiness that expands or contracts in proportion to their adherence to God's commandments.

⁸⁹ Briend notes that מַעַל ‘followed by the noun of the same root and by an object introduced by a preposition belongs to the vocabulary of the book of Ezekiel, of P and of the Chronicler’. (J. Briend, ‘The Sources of the Deuteronomistic History: Research on Joshua 1–12’, in A. de Pury et al (eds.), Israel constructs its History: Deuteronomistic Historiography in recent Research (JSOTSup 306) (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2000), pp.360–386, here p.364).

The converse doctrine of pollution also varies sharply: P holds that the sanctuary is polluted by Israel's moral and ritual violations (Lev. 4:2) committed anywhere in the camp (but not outside), and that this pollution can and must be effaced by the violator's purification offering and, if committed deliberately, by the high priest's sacrifice and confession (Lev. 16:3–22). H, however, concentrates on the polluting force of Israel's violation of the covenant (Lev. 26:15), for example, incest (Lev. 18; 20:11–24), idolatry (Lev. 2:1–6), or depriving the land of its sabbatical rest (Lev. 26:34–35). Pollution for H is nonritualistic, as shown by the metaphoric use of Heb šāmē (e.g., Lev. 18:21, 24; 19:31) and by the fact that the polluted land cannot be expiated by ritual, and, hence, the expulsion of its inhabitants is inexorable (Lev. 18:24–29; 20:2).⁹⁰

and that

The violation of a prohibitive commandment generates impurity and, if severe enough, pollutes the sanctuary from afar. This imagery portrays the priestly theodicy. It declares that while sin may not scar the face of the sinner it does scar the face of the sanctuary ... This image graphically illustrates the priestly version of the old doctrine of collective responsibility: when the evildoers are punished they bring down the righteous with them. ...

Thus, in the priestly scheme, the sanctuary is polluted (read: society is corrupted) by brazen sins (read: the rapacity of the leaders) and also by inadvertent sins (read: the acquiescence of the "silent majority"), with the result that God is driven out of his sanctuary (read: the nation is destroyed).⁹¹

Milgrom's identification of H's theology resonates with understanding Achan's violation of a commandment as generating impurity in the camp that affects all of Israel. So whilst the effects of Achan's crime on the whole Israelite camp could be construed in 'rhetorical' terms, in that the effects help construct an existentially demanding limit-situation in an imaginative way, in another sense, from a priestly (or H) perspective, one can construe the text in terms of the impurity (resulting in the withdrawal of YHWH's presence) that disobedience to the covenant creates. Whilst I argued in chapter 6 that it is wrong to view šāmē as a contagion, what Josh. 7 indicates, from a priestly perspective, is that it is the effects of disobedience to the covenant that contaminate the camp, and not šāmē per se. Or, to put it another way, it demonstrates the communal nature of sin. Here, one need not be concerned with whether or not a 'priestly perspective' was 'originally' in view, for this kind of reading does, at the very least, reflect a 'fitting' exploration of the plenitude of the world of the text, granted the intersection and resonances of the concerns in view in Josh. 7 and the priestly materials.

⁹⁰ J. Milgrom, 'Priestly ("P") Source' in ABD, vol.5, pp.454–461, here, p.457. However, he also notes that 'when it comes to theology, P and H mostly form a single continuum; H articulates and develops what is incipient and even latent in P' (p.454).

⁹¹ Ibid, pp.457–458.

Whilst Achan's story is now resolved, Israel's, and Ai's, are not; whilst the attack on Ai functions largely to develop Achan's story, the wider questions that it has raised must now be answered: Is YHWH still with Israel? Will the 'conquest' continue? Josh. 8 commences with an assurance that YHWH is with Joshua and Israel, and that the attack of Ai will now proceed successfully, with the 'impurity of disobedience' removed. YHWH's instructions differ from the suggestion of the spies in Josh. 7 and from those for the capture of Jericho. The whole army is to be sent (v.1), setting an ambush (v.2).⁹² Moreover, what is declared חָרַץ, and what the Israelites are told that they may take as plunder, differs from that in Josh. 6. Ironically, that which Achan took from Jericho, leading to his death and Israel's defeat at Ai, can now be taken from Ai! A successful attack follows, and thus things have returned to normal for Israel. The story of Josh. 8 is essentially a captivating story to make this point, creating interest and suspense with the description of the ambush, etc.

The stories of Jericho and Ai indicate the need to obey YHWH. It is this, rather than military tactics, that grants Israel success. If Israel obeys YHWH then impregnable walls and obstacles will fall (Jericho) and Israel will not have to worry about her enemies. But if Israel disobeys, then the simplest battle in which a ruin is attacked (Ai) will be lost.⁹³ Israel does not have to worry about how to possess her land or how to 'dispose' of her enemies, for YHWH will take care of this. Rather, Israel must worry about obeying God, an obedience that will lead to blessing and rest. The stories of Rahab and Achan, refracted through the battles at Jericho and Ai, demonstrate the outworking of Josh. 5:13-15; YHWH is not 'for' ethnic Israel, something rather unexpected in view of ideas of favour and the election of Israel, rather YHWH is 'for' those who confess his power and glory, who 'do חָסַד' and obey YHWH, made concrete in obedience to the covenant. Thus we see that it is in the interplay of the narrative and structural levels that one discovers the significance of Joshua as it probes questions of what it is that characterizes the insider and outsider, and that this is done in existential and affective terms, and crucially that a number of elements that are present at the narrative level serve literary or structural requirements, rather than seeking to model or portray desirable behaviour. In other words, it calls for discernment at that narrative level.⁹⁴

⁹² Christian commentators have often been worried about the legitimacy of ambush in warfare, since it involves lying and deception (cf. the discussion of Rahab above), e.g. Augustine's Questions on Joshua 10-11 in ACCS, p.46.

⁹³ Cf. Theodoret, Quest. Josh. 7 (p.281).

Whilst the slightly ambiguous ending to Rahab's story was resolved positively in both Jewish and Christian traditions, being testimony as to how one should construe the story in these contexts, Achan's seemingly unambiguous fate appears to be 'reversed' in the Jewish tradition, where he becomes a model penitent, confessing sin to gain life in the world to come.⁹⁵ The tradition thus, optimistically, tries to reinforce the centrality of the genealogical construction of Israel's identity; Achan is ethnically Israel, and so ultimately remains an 'insider'. Thus the Jewish tradition transforms his story via new myths into a new myth – confession of sin brings life in the world to come. But, given the importance attached to the confession of sin in the Christian tradition, it is particularly interesting (and perhaps disorientating) that the Christian tradition does not make this move. Achan's ultimate fate is not developed. Rather, the Christian tradition is more concerned with punishment in the 'here and now', and with the corporate effects of Achan's crime.⁹⁶ It is interesting that Achan is not developed in the NT, unlike Rahab, even though the idea of covetousness and greed is developed as characterizing the outsider (e.g. Col. 3:5; Jas. 4:2).⁹⁷ Thus Achan's story appears to find rather little Christian significance, perhaps ⁹⁴ I use the terms 'narrative' and 'structural' levels in their neo-structuralist sense as introduced in chapter 2.

⁹⁵ E.g. Lev. Rab. 9.1 (pp.106-107): 'Another interpretation: 'Whoso offereth the sacrifice of thanksgiving (todah), etc.' refers to Achan, who sacrificed his Evil Inclination by means of a confession (todah), [as it is said], And Joshua said unto Achan: My son, give, I pray thee, glory to the Lord, the God of Israel, and make confession (todah) unto Him... and Achan answered Joshua and said: Of a truth I have sinned (Josh. VII, 19 f.). And to him who ordereth his way aright, will I show the salvation of the Lord (Ps. loc. cit.), refers to the fact that he [i.e. Achan] has shown to penitents the way [to the salvation of the Lord]. This is [indicated by] what is written, And the sons of Zerah: Zimri, and Ethan and Heman, and Calcol and Darda: five of them in all (I Chron. II, 6).' A detailed, imaginative retelling of the story is found in Num. Rab. 23.6, in which Achan has a share in the world to come ('This day, he implied, you are troubled, but you will not be troubled in the World to Come, and you have a share therein.' (p.870).

⁹⁶ E.g. Origen, Hom. Joshua 7.6-7 (pp.80-84); Theodoret, Quest. Josh. 10 (pp.283-284); Constitutions of the Holy Apostles 2.3.10 (ANF vol.7, p.790) & 7.1.2 (ibid. p.925). Also see various excerpts in ACCS, pp.41-45.

⁹⁷ Some treat the story of Ananias and Sapphira (Acts 5) as a development of Achan's story. See e.g. H.D. Park, Finding Herem? A Study of Luke-Acts in the Light of Herem (Library of New Testament Studies 357) (London: T&T Clark, 2007), pp.132-143. In general, I find Park's attempt to trace אֶחָא into the New Testament unconvincing, finding 'אֶחָא everywhere' based on rather questionable 'Greek equivalents'.

because of the tension between the narrative dynamics, in which Achan is clearly ‘lost’, and the later Christian importance attached to the confession of sin, which ought to suggest that Achan would be ‘restored to fellowship’.

8.8 Josh. 8:30-35

We considered the different locations of this pericopae in the MT, LXX and 4QJosh^a in chapter 7, and I suggested earlier (8.4) that arguably 4QJosh^a offers the ‘best’ location, even if it is not original.⁹⁸ It reflects the fulfilment of Deut. 11:29 & 27:4ff, and demonstrates the obedience of Joshua and the people. In doing so, it characterizes Joshua and the people as obedient to YHWH. This may help to set the rather ambiguous stories (such as Rahab, and the Gibeonites) in a more positive light; the unswervingly positive portrayal of Joshua in each unambiguous case leads one to appraise the more ambiguous episodes in a positive light.

The ceremony emphasizes the centrality of the Mosaic law for Israel’s life in the land, being central to the construction of Israel’s identity. Daniel Hawk provides an interesting comparison of Josh. 8:30-35 with Deut. 27. He notes that in Deut. 27, the focus is on writing commands on plastered stones, whereas here the focus is on altar building given that it ‘receives first mention and assumes priority in the subsequent account’. He suggests that such a ‘shift in focus evokes a powerful symbol’, since altars throughout the Old Testament ‘constitute a metaphor for social coherence and transformation ...transition in social status or configuration is marked by the construction of altars’ (Gen. 8:20; 12:7-8; 1 Sam. 14:31-35; 2 Sam. 24:25; 1 Kg. 18:30-32; 2 Kg. 16:10; Ezra 3:2-3). The Ebal altar thus symbolically underscores the end of an old order and inaugurates a new social configuration,⁹⁹ and symbolizes the new life into which Israel is called. Having the law written onto the stones is important, for it implies that it is ‘fixed’, and that it will be ‘remembered’ in future generations, something whose importance is highlighted through the study of cultural memory. Moreover, the presence of the entire community here emphasizes the unity of Israel, and that the law is for everyone.

⁹⁸ Although it might be. Its placement in the MT after the Ai incident might suggest that everything is now ‘back to normal’; YHWH is still with Israel, and still has the same expectations of Israel after this incident.

⁹⁹ Hawk, Joshua, pp.133-134.

This story indicates the centrality of torah for being an Israelite, and for Israel's unity and coherence. But how might the story be read in a Christian context? Origen provides us with an imaginative intertextual reading:

I certainly think that whenever "Moses is read" to us and through the grace of the Lord "the veil of the letter is removed" [2 Cor. 3:15-16] and we begin to understand that "the law is spiritual," [Rom. 7:14] then the Lord Jesus reads that law to us. ... The law, which Paul names "spiritual," [Rom. 7:14] is thus understood and Jesus himself is the one who recites these things in the ears of all the people, admonishing us that we not follow "the letter that kills" but that we hold fast "the life-giving spirit." [2 Cor. 3:6]

Therefore, Jesus reads the law to us when he reveals the secret things of the law. For we who are of the catholic church do not reject the law of Moses, but we accept it if Jesus reads it to us. For thus we shall be able to understand the law correctly, if Jesus reads it to us, so that when he reads we may grasp his mind and understanding. Therefore, should we not think that he had understood this mind who said, "And we have the mind of Christ, so that we may know those things that have been given to us by God, those things that also we speak"? [1 Cor. 2:12-13] Also, those who were saying, "Was not our heart burning within us, when he laid bare the Scriptures to us along the way?" [Lk. 24:32] when "beginning from the law of Moses up to the prophets he read all things to us and revealed those things that were written concerning him"? [Lk. 24:27]¹⁰⁰

Moreover, Jesus is portrayed as 'fulfilling' (from πληρώω) (Matt. 5:17) the law, or being the end or goal (τέλος) of the law (Rom. 10:4).¹⁰¹ Thus in the Christian context the move that the tradition, i.e. the community that uses these texts to construct their identity, clearly makes is to transpose the centrality of torah to the centrality of Jesus; obedience to the law is understood as obedience to Jesus. Thus in juxtaposition with 'new myths', this 'old myth' finds its continuing significance in this sort of way.

8.9 Josh. 9-10

The account of the Gibeonites, in which they trick the Israelites into making a treaty with them in order to save themselves, is a difficult and ambiguous story to interpret, and it is interesting to see how different the evaluations of it are in the commentaries. In some ways the Gibeonites are like Rahab; They respond differently from other locals, apparently motivated by the fear of Israel being given the land and of the locals being destroyed (שָׂמַר) (9:24), recognizing that resistance is futile. Hess notes that both Rahab and the Gibeonites escape through negotiation, and that both stories precede an account of war against their territory, and that in both cases deliverance occurs after the ¹⁰⁰ Origen, Homilies on Joshua. 9.8, FC 105:103-104, in ACCS, p.51-52.

¹⁰¹ Of course the meaning of these texts have been much disputed.

‘confession’ of YHWH’s deeds on behalf of Israel.¹⁰² Similarly Nelson notes that both Rahab and the Gibeonites are threatened foreigners who outwit Israel, where each appreciate YHWH’s mighty acts,¹⁰³ and Creach also suggests that the Gibeonites’ speech (9:9-10) is like Rahab’s (2:9-11).¹⁰⁴ But commentators also suggest that the Gibeonites are like Achan; Hess suggests that in each story Israel errs without realising it, with a successful battle occurring after the fault is identified. Moreover, he notes that in 9:20 the wrath (קצף) that the leaders wish to avoid is a term that occurs elsewhere in Joshua only in 22:20 where it recalls the wrath against Israel because of Achan.¹⁰⁵ Nelson suggests that whilst Rahab remains a positive figure, the Gibeonites are enslaved deceivers, correlating with Achan; Josh. 9 is a ‘problematic prelude’ for Josh. 10, like Josh. 7 is for Josh. 8. Moreover, he notes that the Gibeonites are said to be בקרב Israel (9:7, 16, 22) like the חרם was (7:12-13).¹⁰⁶

However, Rahab was also said to be בקרב Israel (6:25). Indeed, קרב appears to be a Leitwort in Joshua, for lots of things or people are said to be ‘in the midst’ of Israel. So perhaps Joshua invites one to ponder what is, or what should be, ‘in the midst’ of Israel. Indeed, קרב occurs in many of the major accounts in Joshua; the prologue, the Jordan crossing, Rahab’s story, Achan’s story, the Gibeonites’ story, the distribution of the land and the covenant ceremonies:

- 1:11; 3:2 the officers (שוטרים) are בקרב Israel to give instructions;
- 3:5 YHWH will ‘do נפלאות’ in Israel’s midst;
- 3:10 the living god (אל חי) is in Israel’s midst;
- 4:6 the collection of stones that will serve as a sign (אור) is in Israel’s midst;
- 6:25 Rahab and her family are in Israel’s midst;

¹⁰² Hess, Joshua, p.177.
¹⁰³ Nelson, Joshua, p.131.
¹⁰⁴ Creach, Joshua, p.86.
¹⁰⁵ Hess, Joshua, pp.177-183.
¹⁰⁶ Nelson, Joshua, pp.131-132.

7:12 & 13	חֵרֶם is in Israel's midst;
8:35	the sojourner (גֵּר) is in Israel's midst at the covenant ceremony;
9:7, 16, 22; 10:1	the Gibeonites (Hivites) are in Israel's midst;
13:13; 16:10	peoples not driven out live in Israel's midst (Geshurites & Maacathites (13:13); Canaanites near Gezer (16:10);
18:7	the Levites are in the midst of Israel;
24:5	YHWH struck Egypt by what he did in her midst;
24:17	Israel crossed 'in the midst' of other people;
24:23	Israel is exhorted to put away the foreign gods (אלהי הנכר) that are in her midst.

So, if, as I have argued, Rahab is to be seen in a positive light, an example of an outsider who becomes an insider, and Achan in a negative light, an insider who becomes an outsider, then what about the Gibeonites, who are associated with both Rahab and Achan via various literary cues? However, the association of the Gibeonites with Achan seems rather tenuous, although comparison with Rahab is interesting, especially if one compares their 'confessions'. The 'confession' (acknowledgement of YHWH's deeds?) of the Gibeonites is less impressive than Rahab's. Rahab's 'acknowledgement' is indeed more of a 'confession', and one that is, in fact, of a superlative nature in the Old Testament, as we saw. But the Gibeonites' 'confession' is far less impressive (9:24), and only relates to what they fear for themselves, rather than to who YHWH is, which is something that Rahab's confession reflects, although both represent a realisation of the state of affairs that results in their taking action to prevent their annihilation.

However, whilst Rahab 'does חסד', the Gibeonites act with ערמה. This deception of the Gibeonites (the Hivites) seems to reflect Israel's deceitful action against Shechem the Hivite in Gen. 34. Is Josh. 9 thus an ironic reversal to be read alongside Gen. 34? If so, then what does this indicate; that the Israelites and the Gibeonites are essentially 'one and the same'? But how is the ערמה of the Gibeonites to be interpreted? Is it to be construed positively or negatively?¹⁰⁷ The word resembles the term מַרְמָה used of Jacob when he acquires Esau's birthright (Gen. 27:35), and of Jacob's sons following the rape of Dinah by Shechem the Hivite (Gen. 34:13), which is significant as both these stories have certain affinities with Josh. 9; Israel is what she is through acts of deception, as do the Gibeonites. But מַרְמָה is an unambiguously negative term,¹⁰⁸ and granted the resonances of Josh. 9 with Gen. 34, it seems significant that the unambiguously negative term is avoided here, with the more ambiguous term used instead. This cautions against viewing the Gibeonite action in an unambiguously negative way. In a modern, Western context such deceit is generally taken as unambiguously negative, as indicated in Calvin's reading; he comments on 9:6 that a covenant of this nature is 'null and void' in strict law, and so the Gibeonites do not gain anything by the fraud.¹⁰⁹ But this misses the point; according to the text the treaty was valid, and they did gain here. Indeed, in an Oriental context, such 'cleverness' or 'wiliness' (as in Proverbs) is often seen in a very positive way, as a praiseworthy trait, something that is culturally desirable.¹¹⁰

¹⁰⁷ עֲרֹם is understood negatively in Ex. 21:14, but positively in Prov. 1:4; 8:5, 12. עָרֹם is understood negatively in Gen. 3:1; Job 5:12; 15:5, but positively in Prov. 12:16, 23; 13:16; 14:8, 15, 18; 22:3; 27:12. The verb עָרַם is understood negatively in Job 5:13 & Ps. 83:4, but positively in Prov. 15:5 & 19:25. Its usage in 1 Sam. 23:22 appears ambiguous.

¹⁰⁸ Cf. Gen. 27:35; 34:13; 2 Ki. 9:23; 1 Chr. 8:10; Job 15:35; 31:5; Ps. 5:7; 10:7; 17:1; 24:4; 34:14; 35:20; 36:4; 38:13; 43:1; 50:19; 52:6; 55:12, 24; 109:2; Prov. 11:1; 12:5, 17, 20; 14:8, 25; 20:23; 26:24; Isa. 53:9; Jer. 5:27; 9:5, 7; Dan. 8:25; 11:23; Hos. 12:1, 8; Amos 8:5; Mic. 6:11; Zeph. 1:9.

¹⁰⁹ Calvin, Joshua, p.139.

¹¹⁰ See William Beeman's discussion of zerangi in Iran in which he discusses a number of stories that have resonances with the kind of behaviour exhibited by the Gibeonites in which the action was seen in positive terms (Language, Status, and Power in Iran (Bloomington: Indiana UP, 1986), pp.27-32. He gives the following example: 'One young fellow in the village where I was resident attended high school in Shiraz. He was not very bright but had nonetheless been promised the opportunity to marry his pretty cousin when he graduated from high school. The first thing he did each year was to change high schools, so that no one in the village was ever quite sure which one he was attending. He then would bring his reports home at odd or irregular times, so that his parents had no idea of when to expect his grades. In time he was able to convince his parents that he had actually graduated, when in fact he had failed his final examinations. He eventually was married to his cousin and had enlisted in the army before his parents were finally informed in a totally unexpected manner that he had in fact not graduated and indeed had not even advanced to the final class in high school, having failed his examinations the year before as well. When I had a chance to question him about this, he told me that whereas his parents were enormously irritated initially (to say nothing of his uncle, who expected a high-school graduate for a son-in-law), they were eventually convinced by their neighbors and relatives that his extraordinary zerangi in the whole matter more than offset his lack of filial duty, and that now he was married with a good dowry and a reasonable position in the army, they should be quite satisfied. Indeed, they had now become quite confident of his success in life. His own feeling was not that he had "put one over" on his parents, but that he had been sure that he would never be able to finish high school from the beginning and he simply wanted to arrange things so that his

But difficulties in evaluating the story are intensified by the lack of explicit interpretation or judgment by the narrator, Joshua or YHWH regarding what has transpired (perhaps reflecting the ambiguous ending of Gen. 34). Joshua complains of the Gibeonite deceit, and reports that the Gibeonites are under a curse (9:23), but no further evaluation is offered. Is the story really concerned with evaluating Israel's actions here? Perhaps the phrase in 9:14, 'but did not enquire of YHWH' implicitly suggests a negative appraisal, but this remains implicit and is not confirmed. Could this remark, and indeed the whole story, be deliberately ambiguous? Indeed, reading into Josh. 10, the conquest of the land is reported to proceed precisely because of the faithfulness of Israel to the oath made to the Gibeonites, which might suggest a positive reading of the treaty, although it may be the Israelites' faithfulness to the oath that is in view in Josh. 10. Finally, of course, the Gibeonites became, in at least some sense, part of Israel, even if as servants, and were not subjected to חרם.

This raises the next interesting problem; there is no mention of חרם in Josh. 9, or in relation to the Gibeonites, although it returns in Josh. 10 (10:1, 28, 35, 37, 39, 40) with regard to the cities that the Israelites (and also the Gibeonites) fight against, battles that Israel enters precisely as a result of faithfulness to the treaty with the Gibeonites. Indeed, in Josh. 9 one might expect חרם to occur in 9:1 and 9:3, or 9:19 where נגע is used, or 9:24 where שמד is used. Moreover, in 9:24 it is the Gibeonites who say that Moses had been 'clearly told' (הגד הוגד) to destroy (שמד) the inhabitants of the land (which of course includes them) but Israel does not, honouring the treaty made under oath. This seems, in an ironic sense, to raise the difficulty here. What is clear to the Gibeonites regarding what Moses had said is now unclear to the Israelites. Furthermore, when the parents would never have to find out when he eventually was failed, to spare them pain and embarrassment.' (pp.29-30). In other words, it is possible that the action of the Gibeonites ought to be construed in a rather more positive light than it has been traditionally. Moreover, the action of the Gibeonites is also interpreted positively in post-colonial readings of Joshua in which 'the text may become a postcolonial celebration of the duping of dull colonial forces' (R. Boer, 'Green Ants and Gibeonites: B. Wongar, Joshua 9 and some Problems of Postcolonialism', in Semeia 75 (1996), pp.129-152, here p.147).

kings 'west of the Jordan' hear (9:1-2), they do not hear of חָרָם, as in 2:10 and 10:1, or the drying of the Jordan as in 5:1, but merely 'these things', and in 9:3, the Gibeonites are said to hear only of 'what Joshua did to Jericho and Ai', not of their חָרָם, and similarly in 9:10. This is all very unusual. However, we noted the presence of priestly aspects to Josh. 9 in chapter 4. Might one then explain the absence of חָרָם in Josh. 9 via an appeal to its prehistory, possibly being a non-deuteronomistic insertion? Several observations tell against this. First, Josh. 9 is integral with Josh. 10, in which חָרָם repeatedly occurs. Secondly, the story of the Gibeonites is significant for the deuteronomistic tradition (cf. 2 Sam. 21). Thirdly, there is no reference to חָרָם in the important deuteronomistic 'summaries' in Joshua (Josh. 1, 21:43ff, 23-24), and so the absence of חָרָם in Joshua need not imply the addition of a later, non-deuteronomistic passage. Fourthly, conversely, the deuteronomic/deuteronomist(s) author(s) do re-write older stories using חָרָם as an interpretative category,¹¹¹ and so if this was an older story employed by a deuteronomistic author then its absence here is significant. Finally, the term the Gibeonites employ, שָׁמֵר, is rare in the Pentateuch outside Deuteronomy, (only occurring in Gen. 34:40; Lev. 26:30 & Num. 33:52) and is not used in any of these places in relation to a command to Moses to destroy the local inhabitants, but it is common in Deuteronomy (used 29x), suggesting that the story reflects deuteronomistic shaping. Indeed, the story seems to be based upon Deut. 20, indicated in 9:7.¹¹² Thus, in conclusion, the absence of חָרָם is significant, suggesting that the story is more than an aetiology or a priestly insertion for example.¹¹³ I shall return to this point below and in chapter 9, when I develop the significance of חָרָם in Joshua.

¹¹¹ E.g. Deut. 2:24-3:11 rewrites Num. 21:21-35 using חָרָם (2:34; 3:6).

¹¹² Moreover, Hawk suggests that the story has ironic parallels with Deut. 29:1-15 (Joshua, p.141).

¹¹³ Cf. Nelson – the story functions to bolster national identity with the story encouraging the acceptance of a troublesome status quo (Joshua, p.132).

Josh. 9 appears to reflect the use of standard motifs from a 'submission story', reflecting a story that narrates the formation of something like an ANE vassal treaty.¹¹⁴ But there are important variations from such accounts, suggesting that Josh. 9 is not a story that serves the same or similar function to these, with the differences being highlighted as unusual through comparison. In particular, the failure to consult YHWH, or to make the covenant specifically with reference to his name seems irregular, perhaps illustrating folly and haste on the part of the Israelites. Moreover, no details of the covenant are given apart from the brief note in 9:15; it is simply the fact that the covenant is made, through ערמה, that is significant. Similarly, it is interesting that the reference to the 'kings west of the Jordan' coming to fight Joshua (9:1-2) is not developed in Josh. 9. Only the Amorites mentioned in 9:2 figure in Josh. 10, and then in a different context. Thus it seems that these kings are mentioned in order to contrast them, and their hostile response, with the Gibeonites (cf. 11:19-20, discussed below). Taken together these observations suggest that there are many motifs used in this story to make it 'sound like' a standard kind of story whilst, as discourse, it is about something quite different, as sketched out above.

Origen offers a thoughtful reading of the story in a Christian context:

[E]ven the resurrection of the dead will not exhibit an equal glory of those rising again, for "there is one flesh of birds, another of cattle, and even another of fish. There are both heavenly bodies and earthly bodies; but the glory of heavenly things is one thing, that of the earthly, another. One glory of the sun, another glory of the moon, another glory of the stars. Star differs from star in glory; thus also, the resurrection of the dead."

Therefore, many differences of those who come to salvation are depicted. Whence even now I think those Gibeonites, whose history has been recited, are a certain small portion of those who must be saved but in such a manner that they are not saved apart from the branding of some mark. For you see how they are condemned to become "hewers of wood" or "bearers of water" for the service of the people and for the ministry of the altar of God, because they indeed approached the sons of Israel with deceit and cunning, "clothed in old garments and shoes" and "carrying food of aged bread." Therefore, these persons come to Jesus [Joshua] with all their aged things and greatly beg of him that they may be saved.

Something such as this seems to me to be displayed in their figure. There are in the church certain ones who believe in God, have faith in God, and acquiesce in all the divine precepts. Further more, they are conscientious toward the servants of God and desire to serve them, for they also are fully ready and prepared for the furnishing of the church or for the ministry. But, in fact, they are completely disgusting in their actions and particular habit of life, wrapped up with vices and not wholly "putting away the old self with its actions." Indeed they are enveloped in ancient vices and ¹¹⁴ Cf. examples in chapter 5, and also Grintz and Fensham's comparisons of Josh. 9 with Hittite treaties (J.M. Grintz, 'The Treaty of Joshua with the Gibeonites' in JAOS 86/2 (1966), pp.113-126 & F.C. Fensham, 'The Treaty between Israel and the Gibeonites' in BA 27/3 (1964), pp.96-100).

offensive faults, just as those persons were covered over with old garments and shoes, Apart from the fact that they believe in God and seem to be conscientious toward the servants of God or the worship of the church, they make no attempt to correct or alter their habits. For those, therefore, our Lord Jesus certainly permits salvation, but their salvation itself, in a certain measure, does not escape a note of infamy.¹¹⁵

He continues,

Of course, it must be observed that the heretics reading this passage, those who do not accept the Old Testament, are accustomed to make a malicious charge and say, "See how Jesus [Joshua] the son of Nun showed no human kindness, so that, although permitting salvation, he inflicted a mark of infamy and a yoke of servitude upon those men who had come to him in supplication." If the soul less instructed in the divine Scriptures hears these things, it can in consequence be enfeebled and endangered, so that it may shun the catholic faith; for they do not understand their deceptions. For Jesus [Joshua] passed a fitting judgment upon them according to the measure of their own faith.

Formerly Rahab the harlot, who believed with a sound faith with all her house and received the Israelite spies with fullest devotion, was received fully into the community and society of the people; and it is written of her that "she was attached to the sons of Israel until today." But those who did not so much love the community of the Israelite clan as they were terrified by fear of their destruction approached Jesus [Joshua] with cunning and fraud. How could they deserve the liberty of life and the community of the kingdom in their slavish deceits?

Finally, do you wish to know that the condition was dispensed toward them by Jesus [Joshua] because the inferiority of their disposition was fitting for them. They themselves say, "We have heard how many things the Lord did for you" through the midst of the Red Sea and in the desert, And although they said these things and confessed that they had both heard and known of the divine miracles, yet they produced nothing worthy in faith, nothing in admiration of such great powers. And therefore Jesus, when he sees the narrowness and smallness displayed in their faith, preserves a very just moderation towards them, so that they might merit salvation. Although they had brought a little faith, nevertheless they did not receive the highest rank of the kingdom or of freedom because their faith was not ennobled by the increase of works, since the apostle James declares, "faith without works is dead."¹¹⁶

For Origen the Gibeonites are insiders, but insiders with a problematic status.

In Josh. 10 the Israelites come to the assistance of the Gibeonites who are attacked by a coalition of kings in response to what Israel has done so far, and the treaty that has been made. Following the defeat, and humiliation, of the kings, the Israelites proceed to capture a series of southern cities. In the battle at Gibeon YHWH's assistance is portrayed more in terms of standard 'divine warrior' motifs than is the case elsewhere in Joshua; there is המם (panic/confusion) caused by YHWH (10:10), there are 'large stones from heaven' (אבנים גדלות מן-השמים) (10:11), the assistance of the sun and moon (10:12-14)¹¹⁷ and the report that YHWH fought for Israel (10:14, 42). This is indicative of the use of standard motifs of ANE battle accounts.¹¹⁸ Moreover, Nelson notes that the humiliation of the defeated kings in the manner indicated - placing feet on their necks (10:24) is a symbol of unconditional surrender, and that the 'psychological impact' of this symbolism was appreciated in ANE iconography.¹¹⁹ Here, however, the royal symbol is 'democratized' for it is the commanders rather than the king (or Joshua) who perform it. Moreover, hanging their bodies on trees (10:25) is a 'demonstrative act of contempt', although Deut. 21:22-23 is obeyed (10:27, cf. 8:29).¹²⁰ Thus as in Josh. 9, Josh. 10 is told using a number of standard 'literary motifs', being a story based around standard building blocks of familiar motifs.

¹¹⁵ Hom Josh. 10.1, FC 105, pp. 109-110.

¹¹⁶ Hom. Josh. 10.2, FC 105, pp.111-112.

¹¹⁷ See B. Margalit, 'The Day the Sun did not stand still: A new look at Joshua X 8-15', in VT 42:4 (1992), pp.466-491 for a study of this 'poetic fragment' and possible shifts in meaning resulting from the redaction of the text.

As with Josh. 8, there may be little in the details of the story, as narrative, that find significance in their own right at this level of description.¹²¹ Indeed, Josh. 10-11 probably reflect the most theologically and ethically difficult and troubling stories in Joshua, and Christian interpreters have struggled with 10:16-28 in particular, with even Antiochene interpreters resorting to allegory.¹²² Likewise, the account of conquest of the southern cities that follows is difficult, with it being common to 'allegorize' the place names in the narrative to infer an existential, spiritual significance to the story.¹²³ But does it help to know that reports such as in 10:41-42, in which Joshua is said to have killed everything that breathed as YHWH had commanded, and that YHWH fought for Israel, appear to ¹¹⁸ See the texts cited in chapter 5 and cf. M. Weinfeld, 'Divine Intervention in War in Ancient Israel and in the Ancient Near East', in H. Tadmor & M. Weinfeld (eds), History, Historiography and Interpretation: Studies in biblical and cuneiform literatures (Jerusalem: The Magnes Press, 1984), pp.121-147; P.D. Miller, The Divine Warrior in early Israel (Harvard Semitic Monographs 5) (Cambridge: Harvard UP, 1973); S-M. Kang, Divine War in the Old Testament and in the Ancient Near East (BZAW 177) (Berlin: Walter de Gruyter, 1989).

¹¹⁹ Cf. ANEP, p.351, 355, 393. Also cf. Deut. 33:29; 1 Kg. 5:17[Heb] & Ps. 110:1.

¹²⁰ Nelson, Joshua, p.146.

¹²¹ Cf. Gregory of Nyssa's first homily on Ecclesiastes - 'In all the other scriptures [i.e., other than Ecclesiastes], whether histories or prophecies, the aim of the book also includes other things not wholly of service to the Church. Why should the Church be concerned to learn precisely the circumstances of battles, or who became the rulers of nations and founders of cities, which settlers originated where, or what kingdoms will appear in time to come, and all the marriages and births which were diligently recorded, and all the details of this kind which can be learned from each book of scripture? Why should it help the Church so much in its struggle towards its goal of godliness?' (Homily 1, trans. S.G. Hall & R. Moriarty in S.G. Hall (ed), Gregory of Nyssa: Homilies on Ecclesiastes: An English Version with Supporting Studies (Berlin: Walter de Gruyter, 1993), pp.33-34).

¹²² Hill notes that Theodoret may be dependent on Origen here (Quest. Josh. 12, cf. Origen, Hom. Josh. 8.7), (Quest. Josh., p.287).

¹²³ E.g. Hom. Josh. 13.2, pp.126-127. 'Allegorize' is not quite the right term, for Origen attempts to adapt the meanings of the names rather than impose an entirely different meaning.

reflect a pool of standard storytelling motifs, reflecting the kind of language that one finds in ANE ‘conquest accounts’? Initially, one might say that in Josh. 1:6-9 there is a transformation of language from the military realm to the realm of torah obedience, with such imagery developed in a metaphorical direction, used to evoke obedience to God at an existential level, as one finds in Eph. 6:10-18, a text often used to interpret Joshua.¹²⁴ So perhaps the language of ‘God fighting for us’, and the portrayal of complete conquest, finds its significance in indirect existential ways, evoking the idea that God works on one’s behalf when one obeys him.¹²⁵ Indeed, the repetitive, formulaic and stylized narrative of 10:29-42 emphasises obedience resulting in the easy sweep of conquest through the land, culminating in the report that ‘Joshua subdued (נכר) the land’ (10:40).

But beyond this, and perhaps more significantly, it may be worth considering how, at the broader level, the various story ‘blocks’ in Joshua form part of an overall strategy to construct an Israelite identity that uses חור as the central, and symbolic, theme that the stories are built around. We have ‘outsiders’ (the hostile kings) confirmed as such through their aggressive response to Israel in light of reports of חור, and ‘insiders’ (Joshua and the Israelites) confirmed as such through obedience to God manifested in obedience to חור, an obedience that leads to success. Moreover, if Achan contrasts with Rahab, a contrast developed using חור, then perhaps the hostile kings contrast with the Gibeonites. But if Rahab is the outsider who becomes an insider, and Achan an insider who becomes an outsider, then the five hostile kings are outsiders whose ‘otherness’ is manifested in their hostility, and confirmed in their deaths, whilst the Gibeonites are outsiders who form a borderline case – are they outsiders or insiders? The ambiguity of the story, and their eventual status, seems to reflect this difficulty. The story seems to be deliberately ambiguous to make the reader explore the story and their own attitudes. But it is noteworthy that there is no חרם mentioned in connection with the Gibeonites. In a sense then, in Joshua 'confrontation' with חרם forms a 'test' to establish identity. Rahab reacts 'for YHWH' when confronted with חרם, whereas the five kings react 'against YHWH' when confronted with it whilst Achan likewise reacts 'against YHWH' but in a different way when confronted with it. Perhaps, then, what the story of the Gibeonites is indicating by its lack of חרם is that this 'test' is too crude to probe identity near the boundary, in difficult cases. The characteristics of the Gibeonites are then typical of those near the boundary of the community.

¹²⁴ E.g. Hom. Josh. 15.1, ‘In short, knowing that now we do not have to wage physical wars, but that the struggles of the soul have to be exerted against spiritual adversaries, the Apostle, just as a military leader, gives an order to the soldiers of Christ, saying, “Put on the armor of God, so that you may be able to stand firm against the cunning devices of the Devil.”’ (p.138).

¹²⁵ Recall the discussion of Mekhilta Shirata in chapter 3; God is a ‘man of war’, but not quite like a ‘man of war’ in any sense that we can easily envisage – hence the need for metaphor and symbol, and their careful use; God fights for Israel, but only when they are in need.

Thus we see how this 'probing' associated with חרם reflects the construction of identity at the narrative level in a way that reflects the development and 'pushing' of an underlying identity at the structural level (i.e. of categories of insiders and outsiders and their relationships), even if much of the story does not find significance at the narrative level per se, serving structural and literary requirements instead. In other words, these stories, whilst set in the context of a story narrating conquest, are not, as discourse, jingoistic tales, but stories that seek to probe difficult questions of Israel's identity in rather challenging ways. Perhaps one might say that the narrator skilfully uses jingoistic and 'xenophobic' discourse to challenge and qualify that very discourse, the problem being that it is often the jingoistic discourse that is appropriated, as its symbolism becomes obscured, tired and ossified. I shall return to these issues in chapter 9.

8.10 Josh. 11-12

The portrayal of the Canaanite response to Israel throughout Josh. 1-11 demonstrates increasing resolve and desire to fight (5:1; 9:1; 10:1-5; 11:1-5), with 11:1-5 forming the 'literary climax'. Moreover, every military campaign since Ai is portrayed as a defensive reaction to Canaanite aggression,¹²⁶ with such aggression reaching a climax in Josh. 11, being depicted with the use of Canaanite ‘fearful fighting machinery’ (11:4).¹²⁷ Again, the Gibeonites are contrasted with other locals (11:19) and perhaps it is significant that it is the inhabitants of Gibeon that are contrasted with other local kings (cf. 9:1, 3-4a).¹²⁸ Indeed, the cities that were fought against are depicted as royal cities, and Creach suggests that Josh. 10-11 narrates ‘a repudiation and defeat of royal power. The problem is ... a form of monarchy based on oppression.’ He goes on to suggest that this idea is the key to the meaning of YHWH’s instruction to burn chariots and hamstring horses (11:6); ‘These two parts of the military machine symbolized the application of royal hegemony, gained often through brutality and abuse.’¹²⁹ Furthermore, Hawk notes that there are no details of the battles given, and that Hazor is singled out because it is the head of the kingdoms, ‘exemplifying Canaanite threat’, with the Anakim serving as symbols of Canaanite power.¹³⁰ So despite the wider frame of reference of the commands to take the land, Josh. 11 portrays Israel’s campaign of conquest of Canaan as an essentially defensive reaction against aggressive military power.

¹²⁶ L.G. Stone, 'Ethical and Apologetic Tendencies in the Redaction of the Book of Joshua', in CBQ 53 (1991), pp.25-36, here pp. 31-33. The only two 'aggressive' campaigns (Jericho and Ai) seem mainly concerned with the stories of Rahab and Achan.

Indeed, Joshua offers here a rather different perspective and interpretation of the conquest than is found in Deuteronomy. Stone comments that Josh. 11:19 is the surprise of the whole account ... The text comes close to suggesting that war would not have been necessary had the Canaanite response been more cooperative. Moreover, 11:20 goes on to compare their response with Pharaoh’s hard heart, completing the analogy with the exodus. ... Pharaoh’s destruction is tied directly to the question of his response. Similarly, Israel’s presence in Canaan presents Egypt’s nominal representatives – the Canaanite kings – with the action of Yahweh, and likewise demands a response. ... Thus the destruction of the Canaanites is not because they are religiously decadent, nor is it because they have perpetrated economic oppression on the landed peasantry. They have resisted the action of Yahweh and thus have perished.¹³¹

Stone’s last remark reinforces the line of interpretation developed above in which Josh. 2-10 is construed as depicting varying responses to confrontation with YHWH’s action and command, symbolized as חָרַם, responses that reflect identity.

Josh. 11 differs from Deuteronomy in several important ways. First, Deuteronomy ‘justifies’ the dispossession of the local peoples on the grounds of their ‘moral ¹²⁷ Hess, Joshua, p.211.

¹²⁸ Stone, ‘Tendencies’, p.30.

¹²⁹ Creach, Joshua, p.94.

¹³⁰ Hawk, Joshua, pp.170-174.

¹³¹ Stone, ‘Tendencies’, pp.33-34.

wickedness' (e.g. Deut. 9:4-6, although this is explicitly not coupled with a portrayal of Israel as righteous), which is an apologetic that we do not find in Joshua; rather the 'apologetic' here is, generally speaking, that Israel's actions are a response to aggression; Secondly, Deuteronomy does not offer the possibility of peace treaties in the way that Josh. 11:19 seems to imply that they could have been (cf. Deut. 7, 20). Yet in all this, Joshua is portrayed as obedient and faithful to all that YHWH commanded Moses (Josh. 11:15), a note that serves, perhaps, not to legitimate violence, but rather to legitimate the way that Rahab, Achan, the Gibeonites, and the aggressive kings have been dealt with, as symbolic characters who embody and exemplify different sorts of responsiveness to YHWH that relates to structural level concerns of Israelite identity and relationships with non-Israelites, concerns that are given content at the cultural and narrative levels through categories such as obedience and חסד, (positively), and aggression and חמד (negatively).

The motif of the hardening of the heart, in its various Hebrew forms,¹³² has occasioned considerable debate in the Christian tradition.¹³³ William Ford, rather than seeking to 'abstract the "hardening" as a theological issue that needs to be solved',¹³⁴ takes a 'narrative approach' to Exodus and considers the role of the reports of hardening and who it is that is reported as the agent of the hardening in the context of the person addressed, relating it to the response sought by YHWH in that person (or people).¹³⁵ But Josh. 11 evokes Exodus, with the aggressive kings who stubbornly fight Israel evoking the stubborn, oppressive pharaoh who refuses to recognize and glorify YHWH. The stubborn pharaoh who will not let Israel go is balanced by the stubborn kings who will not let ¹³² The motif occurs with the use of four different verbs קשה, חזק, כבד and אָמַץ together with לב as object appears mainly in conjunction with Pharaoh and the plagues in Exodus, where the first three forms are used. Outside Exodus the hardening motif appears in Deut. 2:30; Josh. 11:20; 1 Sam. 6:6; 2 Ch. 36:13; Ps. 95:8 & Isa. 63:17.

¹³³ See e.g. Childs, Exodus, pp.170-175; D.G.C. Cox, 'The Hardening of Pharaoh's Heart in its Literary and Cultural Contexts' in Bibliotheca Sacra 163 (2006), pp.292-311; D.M. Gunn, 'The "Hardening of Pharaoh's Heart": Plot, Character and Theology in Exodus 1-14' in D.J.A. Clines et al (eds), Art and Meaning: Rhetoric in Biblical Literature (JSOTSup 19) (Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1982), pp.72-96 and R.R. Wilson, 'The Hardening of Pharaoh's Heart' in CBQ 41 (1979), pp.18-36. The most recent detailed study is W.A. Ford, God, Pharaoh and Moses: Explaining the Lord's Actions in the Exodus Plagues Narrative (Paternoster Biblical Monographs) (Milton Keynes: Paternoster, 2006).

¹³⁴ Ford, God, p.10.

¹³⁵ Ibid, pp.113-124, 214-217.

Israel come, and thus the reader is invited to interpret the local kings as cruel, stubborn and oppressive pharaohs who fail to respond positively to YHWH just like the pharaoh. If the pharaoh of Exodus personifies evil,¹³⁶ then so do the local kings and their armies.

However, it seems that the ‘hardening’ motif here in Joshua (11:19-20) serves an apologetic function – for it indicates that the ‘conquest’ could have been otherwise - even if for us it reads as strange apologetic. We might find it more convincing to say that the local kings hardened their own hearts, rather than that YHWH hardened them. But if one may apply Ford’s approach to Exodus to Joshua, this hardening note appears in the context of an address to Israel, rather than to the local kings of whom a response is called, and thus serves as reassurance to Israel rather than being a metaphysical description of the true state of affairs that can be viewed ‘from nowhere’. Thus whilst it is apologetic it is not only apologetic.

Moreover, do the references to the Anakim (11:21-22) suggest an apologetic concern? There are a number of groups of characters in the Old Testament who are somewhat ‘mythical’¹³⁷ in nature; the descendants of Amalek, the Anakim, the Rephaim and the Nephilim. Moreover the Amorites, although unlike the other groups in that they are a well known ‘historical’ people, by being drawn into association with these other groups in the world of the text of the Old Testament take on a similar function.¹³⁸ Moreover, the Old Testament tends to draw these groups together more generally, conflating and ¹³⁶ Cf. e.g. Ford, God, p.120.

¹³⁷ In the traditional sense of the word.

¹³⁸ On the Anakim Mattingly comments, ‘In the Egyptian Execration Texts (ANET, 328–29), there are references to several princes with Semitic names who are identified as rulers of ly-‘anaq. Many scholars regard this as a tribal name related to the Anakim, but this connection is not certain (cf. Albright 1928). Apart from these texts, which date to the 19–18th centuries B.C., there are no other extrabiblical references that shed light on the Anakim.’ (G.L. Mattingly, ‘Anak’, in ABD, vol. 1, p.222); The Rephaim, whilst not a historical people, are attested to in various Ugaritic texts. Their identity has been difficult to determine, but following the publication of KTU 1.161 (=RS 34.126) and its analysis by B.A. Levine & J-M. De Tarragon (‘Dead Kings and Rephaim: The Patrons of the Ugaritic Dynasty’, in JAOS 104/4 (1984), pp.649-659) it appears that they are ‘long departed kings (and heroes) who dwell in the netherworld’ (p.656); The Nephilim of Gen. 6 have been compared with the apkallu, the semi-divine ‘sages of old’ in the Mesopotamian king and sage lists. They are understood to have brought civilization to humanity, but some are reported to be evil (cf. the sages (ummiānu) of the Epic of Erra I.147-153 (A.D. Kilmer, ‘The Mesopotamian Counterparts of the Biblical Nephilim’, in E.W Conrad & E.G. Newing (eds) Perspectives on Language and Text (Winona Lake: Eisenbrauns, 1987), pp.39-44); For the Amorites see G.E. Mendenhall, ‘Amorites’, in ABD, vol. 1, pp.199-202.

confusing them: Num. 13:33 reports that the Anakim are descendents of the Nephilim, who are giants, and the Anakim are also said to be giants (Num. 13:28 & Deut. 9:2). But Deut. 2:10-11 reports that the Anakim are considered as Rephaim, Joshua reports that all the Anakim in the land of Israel were destroyed, and whilst Deut. 3:11 suggests that Og was the last of the Rephaim, Josh. 12:4 & 13:12 have Og as one of the last of the Rephaim. Either way, it restricts the existence of these figures to a prototypical past. Deut. 4:47 & 31:4 has Og as an Amorite (cf. Josh. 2:10, etc), and so the Amorites are associated with the Rephaim, thus seeking to shape attitudes towards Amorites. Amos 2:9-10 has Amorites as giants, and Josh. 10:10 has Sihon and Og as Amorite kings east of the Jordan, in addition to Amorite kings west of the Jordan (Josh. 2:10; 5:1; 9:1, 10; 10:5, 6, 12; 11:3; 12:2). However, the Amalekites are not found in Joshua, and only occur in Deuteronomy in 25:17 & 19, occurring mainly in Judges and Samuel. The rhetorical effect of this rather bewildering and disorientating set of associations is to confuse and blur the differences between these various 'pre-historical' groups to paint a picture of non-human, stereotypical, large, scary, baddies that are portrayed as the ancestors of groups hostile to Israel such as the Amorites; the Amorites and the portraits of these 'mythical beings' symbolize each other to evoke certain kinds of attitudes towards Israel's hostile neighbours such as the Amorites.¹³⁹ So by reporting in the conclusion of Josh. 11:21-22 that the conquest came to completion with the extermination of the Anakim and their towns, the apologetic character of Josh. 11 is reinforced; the conquest results in the elimination of shadowy, giant pre-historic warrior kings.¹⁴⁰ Setting these shadowy figures of the past, as attested in the Ugaritic materials, in this 'historical narrative' indicates and accentuates the mythological nature of the text, showing it to be set in a prototypical time in the distant past.

¹³⁹ Cf. 'The pre-Israelite residents variously called Nephilim, Rephaim, Anakites, and designated by other more elusive names such as 'Awwîm and 'Êmîm (the dreadful ones?), inhabited diverse regions of Canaan and Transjordan, ranging all the way from Bashan (Golan) in northern Transjordan, through Hebron in the Judean hill country and down to Seir and the southern coastal plain. What is most significant about these traditions is the consistent identification of those almost mythic creatures as non-Israelites, as having descended from other groups, some identifiable and others not, but decidedly not from Israelite ancestors. This perception differs essentially from what we find at Ugarit, for instance, where traditions about Rephaim are prominent.' (B.A. Levine, Numbers 1-20 (AB 4A) (New York: Doubleday, 1993), p.378).

¹⁴⁰ Cf. Levine, Numbers, pp.378-379.

Josh. 11 ends by reporting the completeness of the conquest (11:16, 23) and the obedience of Joshua to both YHWH and Moses (11:15, 23), something that stands in tension with what will follow in Josh. 13-19, thus highlighting the rhetorical nature of the material. Moreover, the report that the land had rest from war (11:23) suggests that such rest was viewed as an important goal of the conquest. The text thus evokes the notion that the cessation of war is associated with obedience to YHWH. It is then a small step to develop this idea eschatologically through a desire for rest, and how it may be achieved.

Finally, Josh. 12 summarizes the defeated kings, giving Joshua something of the appearance of a conquest account, perhaps in order to make the story of an apparently recognizable genre, even if this is not in fact the case, maybe so that it will be used and not disappear into obscurity, and challenge those who most need to be challenged, i.e. those who have a penchant for jingoistic, xenophobic discourse. In other words, Joshua reflects well developed, subtle and crafty rhetoric.

8.11 Josh. 13-21

In chapter 4 we considered the priestly nature of Josh. 13:1-21:42, and the absence of deuteronomistic features, most notably the absence of דבר. Whilst having a different origin from the remainder of the material in Joshua, it reads naturally as a second major section of Joshua, and continuation of the story, as suggested by Josh. 13:1-6, narrating the settlement of the land. In particular, Josh. 13-21 is concerned with the ordering of the tribes within the land (Josh. 13-19), cities of refuge (Josh. 20), and the distribution of the Levites (Josh. 21). However, interwoven with the reports of allocation of land are narratives that provide reflections upon the sort of characteristics that are central to the identity of Israel, thus having affinities with the concerns of Josh. 1-12. Hawk notes,

Like the stories of Rahab, Achan, and the Gibeonites, these stories confuse concepts of territorial possession, kinship ties, and obedience to YHWH in various ways. Caleb represents the ideal Israelite, undaunted by Canaanite might and anxious to take the land promised to him. He is, however, an Israelite of questionable ancestry, a detail hinted at by his identification as a “Kenizzite” (14:14), the name of a clan which in other contexts is associated with the Edomites (Gen 36:11, 15, 42; 1 Chr 1:36, 53). The second and third stories assail the connection between land and kinship by relating land grants awarded to women. By reporting the giving of land to women, the stories of Achsah and Zelophehad’s daughters challenge the patriarchal structures which reinforce both property rights and kinship relations (structures explicitly articulated in the story of pedigreed Achan [7:1]). Possession of land by women undermines the “male-territory” equation and subtly integrates the “other” gender into an Israelite community that traces the promise of the land only through those whose are marked by circumcision (Gen 17:1-14).

The negative side of the program (here the failure to occupy promised land) is expressed, as it is in the story of Achan, by a story about pedigreed Israelites. In this case, the subjects are members of Joshua’s own tribal group, who command the special attention of the nation’s leader (17:14-18). The story sets “the tribe of Joseph” against Joshua and turns the exemplary quality of initiative on its head. The Josephites also request lands, but with less than noble motives. Because they are numerous, they want more than their share, declaring that the hill country is insufficient but rejecting the plains because Canaanites with iron chariots live there. The Josephites thus stand in stark contrast to Caleb, who requests the kind of territory that the Josephites refuse. Given prior reports that Ephraim and Manasseh failed to take many of the Canaanite cities, Joshua’s command that they drive out the Canaanites concludes the episode on a note of failure. ...

The resulting portrait of Israel compromises the status of all boundaries—ethnic, religious, and territorial—which construct community identity.¹⁴¹

So Josh. 13-21 represents a ‘charter’ for constructing the life and identity of Israel, both with respect to establishing claims to land, and with respect to what it is that characterizes the Israelite. Apart from the casting of the lots for the land there is no indication of any direct divine assistance in the settlement, unlike Josh. 1-12, even though such assistance may be implicit (e.g. Josh. 14:12). But as in the other major sections of the book, the rest of the land from war is seen as a goal of settling the land (14:15, cf. 11:23 & 21:44).

However, there are difficulties with the lists of towns and boundaries.¹⁴² Nelson notes that Josh. 13:1-7 reflects Num. 34, but not what follows in Joshua,¹⁴³ and the boundary lists differ again from Ezek. 47-48, which makes no allowance for Transjordanian territory. Hess argues for a twelfth century date for some of the references, but notes that some are seventh or eighth century leading him to conclude that the lists were subject to revision and updating as they continued to form an important basis for territorial claims.¹⁴⁴ Whether or not these dates are correct, this is perhaps the most likely explanation for the differences between the lists, suggesting that this text is ‘mythical’ in the sense that it was ‘living’, shaping and reflecting the society. Indeed, as Nelson notes, ‘Traditional and administrative geography has been reutilized in a narrative and theological framework to build and bolster national identity. The communities that produced and read this literature did so in order to hold fast to their claim on the territories of their ancestors.’¹⁴⁵ The greater precision of the description of Judah might ¹⁴¹ Hawk, Joshua, pp.192-193.

¹⁴² See Nelson, Joshua, pp.193, 212, 214, 229-230, 236-238; Hess, Joshua, pp.247-249, 261.

¹⁴³ Nelson, Joshua, pp.164-165.

¹⁴⁴ Hess, Joshua, pp.247-249, 261.

¹⁴⁵ Nelson, Joshua, p.212.

then be explained in terms of the use of the text being primarily southern. However, it is interesting that Josh. 13-21 is not simply a list of territories; rather, it is a narrative that weaves listings of territories with stories of people together with ‘theological’ summaries.

Caleb is an example of one who follows YHWH ‘wholeheartedly’ (מלא אחר), an expression that occurs here in Josh. 14:8, 9, 14, and only elsewhere in Num. 14:24; 32:11,12; Deut. 1:36; 1 Kg. 11:6. It is a rare characteristic that exemplifies adequate response to YHWH that interprets and is interpreted by his actions. Caleb drives out the Anakim (14:12), and receives a blessing from Joshua (14:13); he is a Kenizzite (14:6), and is in one sense identified with the ‘men of Judah’, but in another sense differentiated from them via this genealogical note (emphasized in 14:14, where there is no mention of Judah).¹⁴⁶ This suggests that he is of ‘questionable pedigree’, yet acts in an exemplary way, perhaps rather like Rahab. Following Caleb’s anticipation of ‘driving out’ (ירש) the locals ‘if YHWH is with me’ (14:12), a ‘driving out’, which, by implication, occurred completely, the land had rest (שקט) from war (14:15).¹⁴⁷ He is portrayed as one who takes bold initiatives based upon trusting in YHWH being with him as a result of YHWH’s promise, and the narrative reports the possession of Hebron as being the result of Caleb’s ‘wholehearted’ following of YHWH. The importance of Caleb’s character is re-iterated in 15:13ff.

אולי יהיה אותי והורשתיים כאשר בדר יהוה

The other stories in Josh. 13-19 indicate that such bold initiative taking is construed positively and is the characteristic required for possessing the land.¹⁴⁸ In 15:16-19 boldness and strength is required to win Caleb’s daughter, Achsah, by capturing Kiriath Sepher, which Othniel does. Following this Achsah makes a bold request of her father, ¹⁴⁶ Hawk notes that Caleb means dog, and that given the ‘low view of dogs in the Hebrew Bible’ the name seems to have a negative connotation and thus ‘enlarges Caleb’s heroic stature through contrast’ (Joshua, p.198).

¹⁴⁷ שקט also occurs in 11:23.

¹⁴⁸ Cf. Hawk, Joshua, pp.192ff.

which he grants.¹⁴⁹ Similarly, Zelophehad's request reflects a certain 'boldness', but is associated with the promise in Numbers (Num. 36), and his daughters duly receive an inheritance. Whilst Ben-Barak notes that inheritance by daughters is attested elsewhere in the ANE,¹⁵⁰ the report of such inheritance here, and the report of Achsah's initiative, along with Rahab's story, suggests that the nature of the identity of the community that Joshua seeks to construct is not as patriarchal as one might think; indeed, as Hawk notes, these stories demonstrate that patriarchy 'does not constitute an essential element of Israelite national identity'.¹⁵¹

Moreover, these qualities of boldness and initiative taking are exemplified by the Danites (19:47-48), where they attack and settle a town outside their inheritance because they had trouble in possessing their allotted territory. The narrative creates the impression that their action is to be construed positively, although it raises the question of the role of the lot, and, arguably, their disobedience, but perhaps this is not a concern of the narrative. It seems that it is the desire to portray their bold initiative in taking possession of the land that is the main concern.¹⁵²

On a negative note, when the people of Joseph complain about their lack of land (17:14), Joshua's response is to suggest that they boldly take more land, but land that is, they complain, associated with Rephaim, and with Canaanites with iron chariots. Their complaint here contrasts them with Caleb (possibly reflecting Num. 13); Caleb went up ¹⁴⁹ Here, I follow Mosca's reading, that it is Achsah making a request of Caleb in 15:18 (P.G. Mosca, 'Who Seduced Whom? A Note on Joshua 15:18/Judges 1:14', in CBQ 46 (1984), pp.18-22)) although I understand Achsah's action more positively; she receives a blessing from Caleb, amid abundant blessings, with her action construed along similar lines to Rahab's and the Gibeonites. (The issue here is in reading וַתִּסְיֶהוּ in 15:18. Mosca notes in a study of the usage of סוּת, that apart from in postexilic work where סוּת followed by ל + infinitive construct is used, ל + infinitive construct functions as a gerund which refers to the subject of סוּת. He thus proposes reading 15:18, 'When she [Achsah] arrived, she beguiled him [Caleb], asking from her father arable land.' Othniel, he notes, 'plays no role at all in the encounter described in Josh. 15:18-20 ... He is neither manipulated nor manipulating' (ibid, p.21). Moreover, he notes that 'what Achsah actually demands is not property as such, but rather that ready access to water which is so essential if her future home in the Negev is to be both habitable and agriculturally productive' (ibid, p.21)).

¹⁵⁰ Z. Ben-Barak, 'Inheritance by Daughters in the Ancient Near East', in JSS 25 (1980), pp.22-33.

¹⁵¹ Hawk, Joshua, p.209.

¹⁵² If the LXX is preferred (see chapter 7), then these qualities of boldness and initiative are still exemplified, but by Judah rather than by the Danites.

against the Anakim and the large cities, whereas the Josephites are afraid to go up against the Rephaim and iron chariots. They lack the boldness and courage that should be exercised in the light of YHWH's promise.¹⁵³ The story ends on a rather ambiguous note; Joshua gives them reassurance that they can do it – but will they?

This theme continues to be developed in 18:1-10 where the procedure of 'treading the land' recalls 1:3 and 14:9, 'reminding both Israel and the reader that the nation will possess just as much of the gift of the land as it cares to traverse', emphasized through wordplay on dividing (והתחלקו 18:5) and wandering (והתהלכו 18:8).¹⁵⁴

Thus obedience, zeal, boldness and initiative are shown to be the characteristics that exemplify response to YHWH's gift and promise. Indeed, Hawk notes with regard to Caleb that

Judah's elaborate and coherent boundaries demonstrate the consequences of the energy and obedience that Caleb symbolizes, while the encyclopedic list of cities shows what can be accomplished by those who eagerly assault the cities of giants. In an even larger sense, Caleb represents the nation itself. The Mosaic promise that motivates him, that "the land on which your foot has trodden shall be an inheritance for you and your children forever" (v. 9), corresponds to YHWH's promise to Israel at the beginning of the book, "every place that the sole of your foot will tread upon I have given to you, as I promised to Moses" (1:3). Both promises, significantly, measure fulfillment in terms of response; the extent of territory "given" depends on how much the subject will "walk" (cf. Deut 11:24-25). The narrator presents Caleb as the embodiment of obedience, zeal, and initiative.¹⁵⁵

Such characteristics are echoed in the Christian context. In Heb. 4:16 Christians are encouraged to 'approach the throne of grace with boldness.'¹⁵⁶ Moreover, bold initiative taking is exemplified in the Canaanite woman who greatly impresses Jesus with her faith (Matt.15:21-28). In other words, the New Testament and Christian perspective of 'faith' offers an important lens through which to interpret Joshua, and perhaps Joshua can give content to what it is that characterizes such 'faith' as one juxtaposes various myths and interprets them in the light of each other. I shall return to this in chapter 9.

¹⁵³ I.e. the boldness and initiative shown here are not autonomous, but the appropriate response resulting from trusting YHWH's promise – the land is a gift, there for the taking.

¹⁵⁴ Hawk, Joshua, p.215.

¹⁵⁵ Hawk, Joshua, pp.195-196.

¹⁵⁶ Cf. the closing lines of Wesley's 'And can it be?'

Bold I approach the eternal throne

And claim the crown, through Christ my own.

The portrayal of conquest here in Josh. 13-21 differs from that in 1-11 in which a complete conquest is envisaged for here there are various references to the failure to drive out (שׁרף) locals; Judah could not drive out the Jebusites (15:63), the Ephraimites could not drive out the Canaanites in Gezer (but did subject them to forced labour (16:10)), and likewise the Manassites were not able to occupy their towns completely, but eventually grew strong enough to subject the Canaanites to forced labour (17:13). There are several points to note: First, forced labour seems to be regarded as a 'second best' to driving out. Secondly, together Judah, Ephraim and Manasseh seem to constitute, symbolically, all of Israel; they are the 'big three'. Apart from a slightly ambiguous note concerning the Danites (19:47) there are no other reports of failure to drive out in the notices of the remainder of the tribes. But such failure is, perhaps, to be inferred from the three symbolic tribes. However, thirdly, it is interesting that there is no report of forced labour with regard to Judah. Thus the text evokes the need for continued action in possessing the land in the world of the readers of the text for them to find 'rest' in life with YHWH in its fulness; the land's possession and settlement is an uncompleted task, which is again suggestive of a latent eschatological picture, being something for Israel to work towards in ways that are explored by the book as a whole (cf. Josh. 23-24 below).

It is interesting to consider the way in which Origen develops the significance of the reference to driving out the Canaanites in 17:16-18 in a Christian context:

For if at last we come to perfection, then the Canaanite is said to have been exterminated by us and handed over to death. But as to how this is accomplished in our flesh, hear the apostle saying, "Mortify your members that are upon the earth: fornication, impurity," and the other things that follow. And again it says, "For those who belong to Christ have crucified their flesh with its vices and lusts." Thus, therefore, in the third stage, that is, when we come to perfection and mortify our members and carry around the death of Christ in our body, the Canaanite is said to be exterminated by us.¹⁵⁷

The existential nature of Origen's reading reflects the existential nature and desire of Joshua as discourse, even though his is a 'spiritualizing' reading that develops the nature of the task that leads to 'rest' in new ways, being an interior struggle rather than an exterior one; the hindrances to finding rest in life with God are not other peoples, but vices and lusts within oneself. Whilst this is not an exegesis of Joshua per se, it can be said to reflect a faithful development of it as discourse in a context in which, through further reflection and ‘revelation’ perhaps, it is clear that the obstacles are internal and not external (cf. Mark 7:14-23). Finding the rest that Israel seeks in Joshua is interpreted in terms of coming to perfection, being a development and reading of the myth of Joshua when it is read in juxtaposition with others.

¹⁵⁷ Hom. Josh. 22:2, pp.190-191.

In chapter 4 we considered the significance of כָּבַד (subdue) in the summary statement in 18:1, comparing its usage here with Gen. 1:28, which relates to the role of humanity in creation, and Num. 32:22 & 29, which finds its fulfilment in Josh. 18:1. Similarly, we saw how Brueggemann compared the ‘finishing’ (כָּלָה) of Gen. 2:1, 2 with the completion of the tabernacle (Ex. 39:32; 40:33) and with the ‘finishing’ of Josh. 19:49-51.¹⁵⁸ Whatever the relative historical origins of these texts, we are now invited to read them in the light of each other as they interpret each other. Israel’s taking possession of and settling in the land is seen as the fulfilment of the charge to humanity at creation, with God dwelling again with humanity in the tabernacle, and later the temple. When read from a deuteronomistic perspective, as the final form of Joshua invites, this might emphasize that the charge to humanity may be conceived in terms of avoiding idolatry and obeying torah. Indeed, the conclusion of this section of the book (21:43-45) is deuteronomistic, reflecting the fulfilment of the promise of the land (cf. 1:3), and the rest as promised (21:44) (cf. e.g. Gen. 12:1-7; 13:14-18 etc.).¹⁵⁹ The convergence of these themes is interesting, since read together from priestly and deuteronomistic perspectives they suggest that God promises rest and blessing for his people, but rest that is attained through obedience to torah, the avoidance of idolatry, boldness, zeal and initiative in the context of trusting responsiveness to YHWH, themes that are developed with regard to the interior life in a Christian context.

In summary then, perhaps the complete conquest of Josh. 1-11 serves to indicate the fruits of obedience; that in some sense God will ‘fight for us’ when ‘we’ obey him, whilst in 13-21 the partial conquest evokes the continual eschatological nature of the task of ¹⁵⁸ Brueggemann, Theology, p.533.

¹⁵⁹ This note of obtaining rest stresses the fulfillment of promise, but strains the unfinished nature of the conquest. But this reflects the different rhetorical goals of the priestly and deuteronomistic sections of Joshua.

‘possessing the land’. Josh. 13-21 also continues to clarify what kind of ‘faith’ (to use a Christian category that describes human responsiveness to God) is to characterize God’s people, concerns that Origen develops. The portrayal of the completeness (or otherwise) of the conquest thus serves a rhetorical function. Josh. 1-11 and 13-21 represent ‘testimonies’ from two traditions; a deuteronomistic and a priestly tradition that are concerned with the construction of Israel’s identity in stories set in the context of possessing and settling the land. The two testimonies, though using different language, demonstrate a remarkable convergence, complementing each other in the construction of Israel’s identity.

8.12 Josh. 22

Josh. 22 narrates the building of an altar by the Transjordanians ‘near’ the Jordan, a construction to which the Cisjordanians object, resulting in a dialogue which reaches an amicable resolution with the Cisjordanians accepting the construction as legitimate. In doing so various important issues are raised, being concerns that appear to drive the story.

We considered the priestly character of Josh. 22 in chapter 4 and saw that 21:43-22:6 (or possibly 21:43-22:8) form a deuteronomistic interjection into the priestly material of Josh. 13-22. Thus Josh. 22:1-6 invites one to read this priestly, or at least ‘priestly-like’ narrative also from a deuteronomistic perspective which now guides its interpretation. Indeed, 22:1-6 integrates the concern with the Transjordanian tribes prevalent throughout Joshua, and indeed Numbers, with this story in such a way as to provide an interpretative key to the account. A strong concern for national unity is thus demonstrated. In 22:1-6 the reader is informed in advance of the obedience and good character of the Transjordanians; they have acted in an exemplary manner thus far, and thus one would expect them to continue to do so.¹⁶⁰ This ‘interjection’ does not really modify the sense of the story, for the Transjordanians emerge positively from 22:7-34 alone, but it reinforces the positive appraisal of their actions.

¹⁶⁰ Cf. Nelson, Joshua, p.247, and Hawk who notes that the piling up of phrases in deuteronomistic idiom ‘forcefully underscores the theme of fidelity to YHWH’ (Joshua, p.234).

Whilst the (essentially) deuteronomistic Josh. 1-11 is concerned with qualifying Israel's identity and self-understanding with respect to questions of ethnicity and response to YHWH developed in the world of the text around response to חַרָם, with similar concerns extending into the priestly Josh. 13-21 with regard to the settlement of the land, Josh. 22 seeks to qualify Israel's identity construction with regard to land and geography, raising the question of what faithful response to YHWH looks like from another angle; where YHWH's people may live and how they may worship him. Hawk suggests that the 'eastern tribes appear throughout the book as implicit reminders of the ambiguities that complicate the formation of a distinctive Israelite community',¹⁶¹ and that Manasseh presents in miniature the tensions within Israel's social structure, being torn in two with the issue of geography dividing, but kinship uniting.¹⁶²

The construction of the altar forms the focus of this story which addresses three main concerns; the Transjordan land, and whether it is unclean (טמא) (22:19); the question of where legitimate offerings may be made (22:19, 23, 26, 28-29), and the purpose of the altar constructed here; and that of the unity of Israel in future generations – are the Transjordanians part of Israel (22:24-28, 34), despite living 'across the Jordan'?

It is significant that the first concern, that of the uncleanness of the land, is raised by the Cisjordanians but not resolved explicitly, even if it is implicitly as we shall see below, which may indicate the extent to which this story is 'pushing' Israelite identity and theology in new directions. Nelson suggests that the notion that the Jordan marks the limit of YHWH's land 'first clearly emerges' in Ezek. 47:13-48:29, and that Josh. 22 implies that the 'unity of Yahweh's people is founded not on geographic proximity, but on shared faith and fidelity in worship'.¹⁶³ Butler notes that the East Jordan is impure because it is not YHWH's possession, rather it is 'your possession' (22:19); 'That means it is land where Yahweh does not live, land which his presence has not sanctified and purified (cf. Amos 7:7).'¹⁶⁴ However, in the story the issue of perspective is crucial, for in 22:19 it is the Cisjordanians who refer to the Transjordan as 'your land' whilst describing the Cisjordan as 'the Lord's land'. Furthermore, Hawk notes that Josh. 13-21 has 'amply demonstrated' that 'a "portion" (ḥēleq) is precisely what situates a tribe within the established boundaries of land and community and legitimates its participation in the life of the nation.' But 22:9 indicates that YHWH has granted the territory to the eastern tribes, and thus in reality it is the western tribes and not YHWH that has made the Jordan a boundary, pointing to a tendency for the tribes to construct boundaries not 'initiated or endorsed by YHWH'.¹⁶⁵ Moreover, attention is drawn to the nature and significance of the Jordan as a boundary, or not, through the use of the verb עבר, or rather its lack of use. We saw earlier that it symbolized transition into or out of the community of Israel. But here Polzin notes that when the Israelite delegation left the Transjordan to report back to the Israelites in Canaan (22:32), although the crossing of the Jordan is indicated in no case is the verb עבר ever used; 'The reason for this is that "the crossing over" had already taken place.' The only place where עבר is used is where one might expect it in 22:19 in the speech of the delegation, where its use demonstrates that the delegation believes that the two and a half tribes must 'cross' into Israel.¹⁶⁶ In other words, the narrator indicates that the Transjordanians have symbolically 'crossed' into life with YHWH, even if they have re-traversed the Jordan, whereas the Cisjordanians believe that the Transjordanians have 'crossed' out of life with YHWH by crossing the Jordan. To put it another way, for the Cisjordanians the land and the river is the 'reality', for the narrator and the Transjordanians it symbolizes that reality, of life in the presence of YHWH. Thus the geography of the land and the location of the various groups symbolize issues of identity. Indeed, the story reaches a resolution where no concessions are required on the part of the Transjordanians, indicating that ultimately the status of the land was not decisive. The perspective of all the parties converges as the symbolic understanding ¹⁶⁴ Butler, Joshua, p.247. Cf. Deut. 32:8 and Ezek. 48.

¹⁶¹ Hawk, Joshua, p.228.

¹⁶² Ibid, pp.234-235.

¹⁶³ Nelson, Joshua, p.250.

¹⁶⁵ Hawk, Joshua, p.242.

¹⁶⁶ Polzin, Deuteronomy, p.138.

prevails. Thus the story is suggestive of a significant development of priestly conceptions of the land.¹⁶⁷

The second and third issues, explicitly raised by the Transjordanians, relate to the purpose of the altar. The Cisjordanians implicitly assume that the altar is for offerings, and thus that it represents both illegitimate worship of YHWH, and a division of Israel, for a single altar for offerings serves a unifying function. But does a מִזְבֵּחַ ('altar') imply offerings? R.D. Haak suggests that

The term mizbēah is also used for another type of construction which serves primarily as a "memorial" ... Several "altars" are given names, often in connection with some unusual event (cf. Gen 33:20; 35:7; Exod 17:15; Josh 22:10–34; and Judg 6:24). In none of these cases are sacrifices actually offered upon these "altars." Whether these constructions were memorials which the author calls "altars" or whether they were altars which later authors attempted to legitimize by assigning an acceptable function is not clear ... A similar case of a rock being designated as a named "memorial" is found in 1 Sam 7:12, but without the term mizbēah being used.

Altars did have other functions. Altars were built to mark the territory associated with the deity (cf. 1 Kgs 18:17–40; 2 Kgs 5:17)...

There are differences among the various "authors" of the Hebrew Bible in their portrayal of altars. The Yahwist assumes Levitical distinctions for the altars even in the pre-Mosaic period. The Priestly author does not allow Levitical distinctions before Sinai. He assumes the existence of only one altar since Sinai but in some senses has reduced its sanctity compared to earlier ideas (e.g., it no longer provides asylum ...). The Deuteronomist (Deut 12:15–24) loosens the connection between the altar and the slaughter of animals prescribed in earlier writings (Lev 17:1–7).¹⁶⁸

Indeed, the Transjordanians make it clear that the 'altar' is not for offerings; rather it is to function as a witness for future generations that testifies to the unity of all Israel. Thus despite appearances, the appearance of a second altar, which is described as a copy (תְּכִנִּית), is in fact intended to foster unity rather than division. Indeed, Hawk suggests that the 'crux of the story revolves around different perceptions of how the nation is to be defined and held together'. The western tribes equate identity with the possession of the land and perceive a danger in plurality if Israel should sacrifice at many sites, with her distinctive identity being lost. But the eastern tribes see bonds of kinship as more definitive for Israelite identity, and for them, the altar represents not division but an attempt to preserve unity.¹⁶⁹ However, it is interesting that we are not told at the ¹⁶⁷ See also J.S. Kloppenborg, 'Joshua 22: The Priestly editing of an Ancient Tradition', in Biblica 62 (1981), pp.347–371 for a brief discussion on the issue of uncleanness of the land, making reference to Hos. 9:3–4; Am. 7:17; 1 Sam. 26:19; 2 Kgs. 5:15–19; Ezek. 11:14–16 & Ps. 137 (pp.359–360).

¹⁶⁸ R.D. Haak, 'Altar', in ABD vol.1, pp.162–167, here p.164.

¹⁶⁹ Hawk, Joshua, pp. 229–230.

beginning what the altar is built for – the reader has a Cisjordan perspective. Moreover the description of the altar (22:10);

מזבח גדול למראה

heightens the reader's concern, with attention being drawn to the imposing nature of the altar. Moreover, the altar's location is ambiguous; which side of the Jordan is it on? In 22:10 it is said to be בארץ כנען whilst in 22:11 it is

אל-מול ארץ כנען אל-גלילות הירדן אל-עבר בני ישראל

Perhaps it is significant that 22:10 reflects the Transjordanian perspective whilst 22:11 reflects the Cisjordanian perspective. Maybe, for the Transjordanians the altar signifies their presence inside the land (i.e., community of Israel) whereas from the Cisjordanian perspective it signifies the Transjordanian presence outside the land and community. As Hawk notes, 'With every clarifying note, the location of the altar becomes increasingly obscure!'¹⁷⁰ He also suggests that an altar constitutes the symbolic centre of a community, 'the place where the polarities of communal life are united and mediated ... an altar provides a place where the untidy oppositions of communal life converge', and thus an 'altar therefore constitutes the perfect symbol and setting for this story which attempts to negotiate the difficult issues of community identity.'¹⁷¹ So the construction of an altar in a 'boundary region' at a disputed location is significant, for this geographical boundary ambiguity may reflect ambiguities in identity construction near the boundaries of the community.

As the story unfolds the reader is shown differing possible interpretations of the altar. It is interesting that its intention is crucial; what is it for? As well as appealing to (presumably) established notions of purity in relation to the land, the Cisjordanians appeal to Achan's story (Josh. 7) and the sin at Peor (Num. 25), understanding the altar building as an act of rebellion like these acts that will bring the wrath of God on all Israel.¹⁷² The Cisjordanian concern is considered by Phinehas, but upon hearing the ¹⁷⁰ Ibid, p.237.

¹⁷¹ Ibid, pp.228-229.

¹⁷² The root מעל is used here (22:16, 20, 22, 31) as in Josh. 7 (7:1), but not in Num. 25. But in Josh. 22 it nothing bad has happened; it is assumed and anticipatory.

Transjordanian perspective, he is satisfied with their response. The altar is built not for offerings, and not as an act of rebellion, and is not an attempt to divide (or does not risk dividing) Israel. Indeed, Phinehas ironically inverts the Cisjordanian interpretation; it is in fact the Cisjordanians that have risked divine wrath, and not the Transjordanians (22:31), who in fact avert it. Moreover, in 22:30-33, the remark that ‘you have rescued the Israelites’ recalls the only other instance of the identical verbal form in Joshua; Rahab’s request (2:13),¹⁷³ suggesting that Rahab parallels the Transjordanians. Whilst the Cisjordanians interpreted Achan as paralleling the Transjordanians, in fact it is the Cisjordanians who parallel Achan, demonstrating again ironic reversals of what is apparently the case. Casting Phinehas as the one who pronounces the verdict grants it authority, for it is the same Phinehas who acted zealously to halt the plague against the Israelites at Peor, the incident referred to earlier by the Cisjordanians (Num. 25:6-13).

Hence this story is similar to those of Rahab and Achan. Despite appearances, and conventional wisdom, Rahab reflects the true Israelite, unlike Achan; despite appearances, it is the Cisjordanian action that threatens God’s wrath, not the Transjordanian action. Moreover, whilst Rahab and Achan’s stories indicate that issues of ethnicity are not finally determinative for Israelite identity, so Josh. 22 indicates that geography and land are not finally determinative either.¹⁷⁴ Josh. 22 indicates the priority of doxalogical response to YHWH and unity. Together with the rest of Joshua, Josh. 22 indicates that many of the expected means that might be used to define identity are qualified, and it is significant that this occurs through the juxtaposition of priestly and deuteronomistic witnesses here in Joshua, testifying to the fittingness of the combination of these two sets of materials since they share many of the same types of concern. However, Christian reading of Josh. 22 appears to be rather preoccupied with a typological reading of the text, discussing it in terms of the ‘true altar’ that is Christ.¹⁷⁵ This, it seems, reflects a rather unconvincing development of the text, being an exploration that is not really fitting and faithful to the text, its dynamics, and what it seeks to show.¹⁷⁶ In this case, the contemporary interpreter is drawn toward the pole of the original act of discourse rather than that of later reception and development as being of most hermeneutical significance.

¹⁷³ Hess, Joshua, p.293.

¹⁷⁴ Whilst Josh. 22 might be taken to indicate that the borders of the ‘clean’ land where YHWH dwells have been expanded, the fact that the initial reference to issues of purity is not resolved in the story would tell against this.

¹⁷⁵ E.g. Origen, Hom. Josh. 3.2 (p.46); 23.6 (pp.218-219), and Theodoret, who concludes. ‘Thus present-day Jews should know and admit that their altar was not the true one but only a prefiguration of it.’ (Quest. Josh. 19.2, p.301).

8.13 Josh. 23

Josh.23:1 introduces a new section of Joshua; 'After many days had passed ...', and the repetition of the reference to achieving נָחַם (rest) (cf. 21:44) is significant, underlining its importance as the goal of the conquest. Josh. 23 is Joshua's first 'farewell speech', charging the Israelites with their ongoing task.¹⁷⁷ Whatever the historical relationship between Josh. 23 and the remainder of the book, Josh. 23 offers a theological commentary on Josh. 1-22, perhaps a 'homiletic commentary', that develops something of Joshua's ongoing significance for the life of Israel. Indeed, Martin Noth stated that Josh. 23 'looks forward and backward in an attempt to interpret the course of events, and draws the relevant practical conclusions about what people should do.'¹⁷⁸

Joshua, now old, assembles the community for a farewell address, an occasion and genre that naturally leads to an account of the book's ongoing significance. Joshua recalls in very general terms what has transpired in a two verse summary of the rest of the book (23:3-4). But here, and in what follows, there is a very interesting (re)interpretation of events. For Josh. 1-11 focused on Israel's action, and obedience, in conducting מִלְחָמָה

¹⁷⁶ In contrast, I suggest with the Christian development of the Jordan crossing (Josh. 3-4) in relation to baptism. For here, in the Christian development of Josh. 3-4 it seems that the symbol of crossing into life is appropriated well in a new context that is fitting with the narrative as discourse in a way that the Christian development of Josh. 22 is not.

¹⁷⁷ Hawk notes that the report that YHWH gives Israel rest (נָחַם) unites the three texts of Josh. 1:2-8, 21:43-45 and 23:1 ff, texts which taken together bring the viewpoints of YHWH, the narrator and Joshua into dialogue (Joshua, p.247). But whereas in 21:43-45 the narrator speaks of possession of the land as something achieved, here (23:5) it is something yet to be achieved – 'Joshua ... transform[s] the glorious certainties of the past into the troubling openness and incompleteness of the future' (pp.247-248). Cf. also Von Rad, 'The odd thing was ... the promises were not regarded as having been given final effect; after the time of Joshua the promise of the land retained its character as a promise for all time – indeed, the very fulfilment of this promise in Joshua made it the source of fresh promises' (Old Testament Theology, Volume II: The Theology of Israel's Prophetic Traditions (London: SCM, ET:1965), p.383).

¹⁷⁸ M. Noth, The Deuteronomistic History, (JSOTSup 15) (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, ET: 1981), p.5.

against the locals, whereas here the focus in relation to the ‘removal’ of the locals is entirely upon YHWH’s action, and action that is interpreted using הָרָף (‘push away’, HALOT) and יָרָשׁ (23:5). Moreover it is YHWH who is said to do the fighting (לָחָם) for Israel here (23:3). This idea runs through the speech, reiterated in 23:9-10, with Israel taking an entirely passive role with regard to warfare, apart perhaps from the rather vague rhetorical statement of 23:10a. However, Israel does not have an entirely passive role; her role is stated in 23:6-8. First, it is expressed in terms of being strong and careful to obey torah (23:6), reflecting classic deuteronomistic idiom;

וחזקתם מאד לשמר ולעשות את כל-הכתוב בספר תורת משה לבלתי
סור-ממנו ימין ושמאול

Moreover, Nelson suggests that ‘the careful obedience that was laid upon Joshua as an individual at the start of the book now becomes the duty of the entire people and of their collective leadership (1:7-8; 23:6, 11). If this duty is fulfilled, then the promises made to Joshua could be continued for following generations (1:5-6, 11; 23:5, 9).’¹⁷⁹ In other words, Israel is ‘to be’ Joshua; Joshua is the paradigmatic Israelite, the hero and role model. But we saw earlier (Josh. 1) that the Deuteronomist had transformed idioms of strength and courage from the domain of warfare into that of torah obedience, and thus the devotion and strength that Joshua exemplified evokes that which is required to obey torah for each Israelite.

However, most significantly, חָרָם is absent in Josh. 23. It was so central a category for Josh. 2-12, and moreover Josh. 23:7-8, 12, being the charge to Israel, clearly reflects Deut. 7:1-5.¹⁸⁰ But Josh. 2-12 and Deut. 7:1-5, texts in which חָרָם appears as a major, if not the central theme, form the ‘conceptual backdrop’ for Josh. 23. Yet there is no mention of חָרָם, even though Josh. 23 essentially provides an account of what the continued significance and practice of חָרָם should ‘look like’. Perhaps Josh. 23 (and ¹⁷⁹ Nelson, Joshua, p.258. Cf. Butler who notes that no successor is appointed to Joshua; the burden is placed on the congregation (Joshua, p.253).

¹⁸⁰ cf. Hawk; Deut.7:1-5 ‘form[s] the conceptual backdrop for the exhortations and warnings Joshua gives’ (Joshua, p.251).

Josh. 24) might be described as being ‘liminal’ narratives that seek to merge the prototypical past of Josh. 1-22 with the reader’s present, sharing and mediating the ‘qualities’ of both eras; Josh. 23-24 provides the continuity that links the reader with Joshua, showing how this prototypical past is to be constitutive of current identity and practice. So here one is shown how to interpret the symbol חרם – the significance of its second-order sense of separation, particularly from idolatry, is accentuated whilst the first-order sense relating to annihilation recedes into the background. Moreover, the absence of חרם can be accounted for by the desire to avoid giving grounds to anyone to construe the contemporary significance of the concept via its first-order sense; i.e. to ensure that people do not ‘take up the sword’, granted the rather risky way in which חרם has been used as the symbolic centre to pose challenging questions of identity and perhaps qualify the discourse of Deuteronomy. Thus as we move into Josh. 23-24 we encounter material that is more readily susceptible to appropriation at the narrative level, rather than to what lies ‘behind’ it as was the case in Josh. 2-12 especially, as it has more ‘points of contact’ with the world of the reader, and is serving a different illocutionary function, to use the language of speech-act theory. Indeed, Nelson suggests that ‘the assurances of past success, though not really denied (vv.9-10, 14), are put in perspective by the challenges of the future. Only continued obedience (vv.6-8, 11) will lead to continued success in the process of Yahweh’s dispossessing of the nations (vv.5, 19, 13; yrš hiphil) so Israel can continue to take possession (v.5; yrš qal) of their land.’¹⁸¹

Thus from a rhetorical perspective the portrayal of an incomplete conquest is almost essential if Israel is to truly be able to ‘see her current self’ in the book of Joshua; it enables the narrative to connect with experience. Had Joshua uniformly portrayed a complete conquest with Israel dwelling secure in the land, then it would be difficult for Israel to appropriate the book in an existential sense. By leaving work still to do, Israel can more readily identify with the book, and thus seek to complete the charge to Joshua, interpreted in the ways outlined; obeying torah, avoiding intermarriage, loving God and rejecting other gods. However, perhaps at another existential level, the faithfulness of ¹⁸¹ Nelson, Joshua, p.259.

YHWH and his fulfilment of promise is vital too; Israel had to be able to trust in the promises of YHWH, and here the promise of possession of the land is fulfilled (23:14-15). The portrayal of God's faithfulness in the past serves grounds continued trust in YHWH in the present with an orientation of future hope. In other words, to achieve the desired rhetorical effect and response to YHWH, a delicate tension needs to be maintained between the incompleteness of conquest on the one hand, and its completion on the other; portraying a uniformly incomplete conquest would give grounds for doubting YHWH's promises and power. Thus portraying both (contradictory) aspects can achieve the desired rhetorical effect. In structuralist perspective, Joshua is a myth that tempers these logical contradictions. In a sense then, to use later categories, one may say that Joshua reflects both latent 'realized' and 'anticipatory' eschatologies; rest with YHWH is in some sense achieved, whilst it is also to be worked towards.

The language of divine anger and covenant violation used here in Josh. 23 recalls the fate of Achan (7:1, 15, 26).¹⁸² Thus to violate the covenant is to place oneself into Achan's shoes, and Israel into the events that surrounded Achan's disobedience, leading one to appropriate Joshua existentially. Moreover, earlier in Joshua the root עבר has repeatedly described how Israel crossed over into the land, whereas in 23:16 it is used to warn Israel not to violate the covenant, with a threat of loss of the land if they do; indeed עבר is used with regard to Achan's covenant violation (7:11, 15). This draws land and covenant together. Crossing into or out of the land reflects 'crossing' into or out of the covenant; life in the land, a land flowing with milk and honey enjoying YHWH's blessing is life in the covenant. The land is a powerful symbol for the covenant.

Moreover, the assertion that YHWH will destroy (שמד) Israel (23:15) is shocking, for it is a term used previously to signify the eradication of the peoples in the land (Deut. 4:26; 7:4, 23; Josh. 9:24; 11:14, 20), and is used in connection with the deaths of Achan and his family (Josh. 7:12).¹⁸³ Moreover, Hawk notes that the term used for perish, אבד, 'often signifies nomadic existence or aimless wandering (Lev. 26:38; Deut. 7:20; 8:19, 20; 11:17; 26:5; 28:20; 30:18). Its use to signify Israel's disappearance from the land thus also intimates the return to a landless and thus disintegrated existence.'¹⁸⁴ It appears here in 23:13 & 16, and is again used in the context of Achan's story (7:7). But the perishing and destruction here is precisely 'from the land'; transgressing (עבר) the covenant leads to a return to nomadic existence outside the land, and is contrasted with the fulfilment of God's promises to bring Israel into, and establish her in the good land (23:13, 15, 16). Thus Josh. 23 exhorts Israel 'to be' Joshua – obeying YHWH resulting in life and the possession of the land, and 'not to be' Achan – disobeying YHWH resulting in death and expulsion from the land. In other words, transgressing the covenant leads to an undoing, a reversal, of the conquest. So, might it be the case that the conquest setting is employed partially to be an existentially challenging warning to Israel? I.e., this driving out of the people of the land will become the fate of Israel if the Israelites transgress the covenant; the conquest will be reversed and other nations will drive Israel out of the good land, with Israelites turning themselves into 'outsiders'.

¹⁸² Ibid, p.257.

¹⁸³ Hawk, Joshua, p.258.

But it is interesting, as Gordon Mitchell notes, that in 23:16 serving other gods is described as breaking (עבר) the covenant, and that this 'is the first occasion that the danger of worshipping foreign gods is clearly stated. Neither has it been offered as an explanation for the extermination of the nations. The danger of their gods is not the justification for killing them, but it is a sufficient cause for retaining a social distance.'¹⁸⁵ This is interesting, and surprising perhaps - that there is so little material in Joshua that explicitly deals with idolatry, and that there is no attempt to justify killing the locals in terms of their moral evil or their idolatry, unlike Deuteronomy. Mitchell goes on to note that 'contact with the nations will itself constitute divine punishment – they are the trap, the scourge, etc.'¹⁸⁶ Indeed, Hawk notes that '[e]thnic separation no longer finds expression through overt violence against the peoples of the land but rather through a strict admonition to maintain communal boundaries,' and that the new focus for staying within the boundaries is expressed in terms of loving (אהב) (23:11) and holding fast to (קרב) (23:8) YHWH, which is set in contrast to clinging to the nations (23:12). The usage of these terms is suggestive of the importance of marriage relationships (cf. Gen. 2:24), and thus, as Hawk notes, exogamy is seen as the ‘quintessential act of “joining” with the remaining nations.’¹⁸⁷ Moreover, Nelson notes that ‘in Deuteronomy intermarriage was permitted only with war captives, who had no families and could be fully integrated into the Israelite social system (Deut. 21:10-14). The concern was not the modern notion of racial or ethnic purity, but the need to shield Yahwistic culture and religion from alien influences.’¹⁸⁸ However, Rahab’s story, especially as received in the Jewish and Christian traditions in which she is incorporated into Israel’s genealogy, provides an important qualification to these ethnic concerns,¹⁸⁹ and reflects Nelson’s suggestion. In other words, Joshua does not reflect an exhortation to racial purity, but an exhortation to avoid idolatry, to avoid being tempted to turn to other gods, and to avoid any associations that are in danger of leading to this, which are usually associated with ‘mingling’ with the locals, because they are usually idolaters.¹⁹⁰ In practice this implies a kind of separation, and this is what is envisaged in the existential appropriation of ארץ. Furthermore, Hawk notes that for the first time in Joshua the peoples of the land are ‘not signified by a list but by the single term “nations”’ a term which occurs here in 23:3, 4, 7, 9, 12 & 13, which corresponds to the seven-fold listings in Deut. 7:1 and Josh. 3:10.¹⁹¹ This move suggests a wider applicability is developed; the text speaks not only about the stereotypical ‘seven nations’, but about nations more generally.

¹⁸⁴ Ibid, p.257.

¹⁸⁵ G. Mitchell, Together in the Land: A Reading of the Book of Joshua (JSOTSup 134) (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1993), pp.112-113.

¹⁸⁶ Ibid, p.114.

¹⁸⁷ Hawk, Joshua, pp.255-256. He notes that marriage, ‘the basic bond by which social units are connected, becomes paradigmatic for the issue of communal boundaries faced by the nation as a whole. ... Exogamy is “going to” the nations in microcosm. ... Intermarriage represents a confusion of the basic bonds of the community and will lead to pain, trouble, and eventually the disappearance of the nation itself, which will “perish from this good land that the LORD has given you.”’ (pp.256-257).

¹⁸⁸ Nelson, Joshua, p.261.

¹⁸⁹ This ‘integration’ is not explicit in Joshua as we saw earlier in Josh. 6.

¹⁹⁰ Whilst I use the term ‘locals’ here, this reflects the portrait of a ‘conquest’ of the land by an external group. If in fact Israel emerged from within Canaan, then ‘locals’ is not the right term, although I shall use it for convenience instead of a cumbersome phrase like ‘those others who do not seek to follow YHWH, or YHWH alone, as made concrete in the books that eventually emerged as the Old Testament’.

¹⁹¹ Hawk, Joshua, p.254. He notes that it is now the nations, and not their land, that is assigned to Israel as their inheritance. (Cf. Ps.2:8; 82:8). Also Nelson notes that ‘Read against the background of other DH portions of Joshua, chapter 23 marks a distinct change in emphasis indicated by a new word not previously used for the population of Canaan, “nations”.’ (Joshua, p.258).

Such ideas find resonances in the New Testament in terms of not being yoked with unbelievers, (2 Cor. 6:14-18), although it is worth noting that in Paul's treatment of various marriage relationships in 1 Cor. 7 that he does not envisage the 'putting away' of unbelieving spouses in existing relationships in the way that, for example, Ezra does (Ezra 9-10). Moreover, it is worth noting the qualification of this idea of separation found in 1 Cor. 5:9-13 – that separation is from immoral Christians and not immoral people outside the church, an exhortation that has resonances with the stories of Rahab and Achan. However, taking ACCS as a guide, there is rather little Christian development of Josh. 23. It is not covered in the extant homilies of Origen, Theodoret considers it only in historicizing terms, relating it historically to Judges,¹⁹² and Tertullian discusses it in passing with reference to the use of pagan literature.¹⁹³

Finally, Hawk suggests that Joshua leads the reader to 'view Israel as a people defined by choices signified by a covenant which constitutes a metaphor for the reciprocal choosing of YHWH and the nation', and this is a theme that we see developed in Josh. 24.¹⁹⁴ Hawk concludes,

The themes that have configured the narrative and the sense of Israelite identity (land, separation, obedience) have steadily been dismantled by both the stories and the rhetoric of the previous episodes. Now forcefully restated, they are shown to be derivative rather than essential marks of national identity. Choosing to follow the God who has fought for the nation, and who promises to continue to fight, establishes the foundation of a distinctive Israelite identity. And if Israel chooses others, it will vanish. YHWH will not fail Israel. Will Israel hold fast to YHWH?¹⁹⁵

8.14 Josh. 24¹⁹⁶

Josh. 24 mostly comprises of Joshua's second farewell speech. It has attracted much scholarly attention, particularly in the wake of its use by Gerhard von Rad,¹⁹⁷ who argued that Josh. 24:1-13, along with Deut. 6:20-24 & 26:5-9 'constitute Israel's earliest and most characteristic theological articulation', being 'highly studied recitals, situated in ¹⁹² Quest. Josh. 19.3, p.301.

¹⁹³ On Idolatry 10, in ACCS, p.93.

¹⁹⁴ Hawk, Joshua, p.252.

¹⁹⁵ Ibid. p.252.

¹⁹⁶ The most recent major study is W.T. Koopmans, Joshua 24 as Poetic Narrative (JSOTSup 93) (Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1990).

¹⁹⁷ G. von Rad, 'The Form-critical problem of the Hexateuch', in The Problem of the Hexateuch and other Essays (London: SCM, ET: 1966), pp.1-78.

contexts of worship and instruction'.¹⁹⁸ These texts were formative for von Rad's understanding of 'Israel's theology as a narrative rendering of what has happened in Israel's past, a narrative that still has decisive, defining power for subsequent generations.'¹⁹⁹ For von Rad, in his Old Testament Theology,

The substance of Israel's theology ... consists in a recital of God's "mighty deeds" that had been worked in Israel's past. These mighty acts continued to claim Israel's imagination and to evoke Israel's trust and confidence. Israel trusted that the God who had delivered, led, and given land would continue to act in the same ways in the present and into the future.²⁰⁰

Significant for von Rad was the absence of the Sinai covenant in Josh. 24, suggesting that there were two separate parallel traditions in early Israel; a Sinai tradition, and a 'redemption story' relating to settlement in the land. The absence of the covenant is thus significant for the interpretation of this passage.

The transition from Josh. 23 to 24 is awkward. Joshua had assembled Israel in Josh. 23 for his farewell speech, and without any notice of dismissal the narrative moves immediately into a report of the assembling of Israel again in 24:1. Moreover, whilst Josh. 23 is saturated with characteristically deuteronomistic language and concerns, Josh. 24 is not. Josh. 24 has been the subject of scholarly controversy, with there being no consensus about its compositional history, origin, or relationship to the history and cultic life of Israel. It was first attributed to E, then later J, and although deuteronomistic editing has been recognized, 'contradictory proposals about the text's composition have proliferated'.²⁰¹ In particular, its relationship to the DH and to Josh. 23 are problematic, and Nelson notes that Richter, Bonn, Fritz and Smend see Josh. 24 as 'the DH conclusion for Joshua and chapter 23 as secondary to it', whereas he argues for the opposite, whilst Mayes and O'Brien 'maintain that neither chapter was part of the original DH'. But Nelson suggests that 'theorizing about this chapter has tended to outstrip the available evidence' although 'its language reflects that of Genesis-Numbers' and 'expressions also occur which are at least consistent with deuteronomistic usage'; (the leadership catalogue (24:1), 'saw with your own eyes' (24:7), 'took possession of their land' (24:8), the nation list (24:11), 24:13, 'fear and serve' (24:14), 'forsake Yahweh to serve other gods' (24:16, ¹⁹⁸ Brueggemann, Theology, p.32.

¹⁹⁹ Ibid, p.32.

²⁰⁰ Ibid, p.34.

²⁰¹ Nelson, Joshua, p.265, with bibliography.

20) and 'serve and obey' (24:25)), although, ספר תורת אלהים ('law book of God') (v.26) is a 'conspicuously non-deuteronomistic phrase (cf. Neh. 8:8, 18).'²⁰² However, with one possible exception, none of the language in Josh. 24 is specifically deuteronomistic according to Weinfeld. All the instances of (possibly) deuteronomistic language that he lists in Josh. 24 have in fact, according to him, 'pre-deuteronomistic' origins and uses.²⁰³ The one possible exception occurs in Josh. 24:31, ידעו את כל-מעשה יהוה אשר עשה

which he compares with Deut. 11:7;²⁰⁴

הראת את-כל-מעשה יהוה הגדל אשר עשה

But the wording is different, and one may question whether it is reasonable to call this expression 'deuteronomistic' based on its usage only in Deut. 11:7, Josh. 24:31 (= Judg. 2:7), and Judg. 2:10. Thus Josh. 24 is not in fact 'deuteronomistic', even though, as we shall see, it reads well alongside the clearly deuteronomistic Josh. 23. It does not seem specifically priestly either, and thus in its context of the final form of Joshua, it is testimony to the convergence of a number of traditions. Indeed, Nelson suggests that Josh. 24 reflects traditions not found elsewhere in the Pentateuch or Joshua, such as the ancestors' worship of foreign gods beyond the Euphrates and Egypt (24:2, 14-15),²⁰⁵ and a battle at Jericho (24:11),²⁰⁶ and traces a number of allusions to stories in Genesis, Exodus and Numbers.²⁰⁷ Thus there is a sense in which Josh. 24 does form a fitting conclusion to what might be labelled the 'Hexateuch' as well as to Joshua given that it offers a summary of much of the story of both the Pentateuch and Joshua, although not, significantly, of any of the covenants, be that of the law giving at Sinai, or the covenant with Abraham. Indeed, Nelson suggests that ²⁰² Ibid, pp.266-271.

²⁰³ M. Weinfeld, Deuteronomy and the Deuteronomistic School (Oxford: Clarendon, 1972), pp.320, 332 & 357.

²⁰⁴ Ibid, p.329.

²⁰⁵ Nelson, Joshua, p.275. This tradition is found in Ezek. 20:7; 23:3, 8.

²⁰⁶ Ibid, p.266. Nelson suggests, 'Verse 11 presents a version of the Jericho victory at odds with the one in Joshua 6, although perhaps present in some earlier form of the Rahab story. The ungainly inclusion of the nation-list in this verse widens its horizons so that the sentence can refer to the whole conquest. This suggests Jericho's paradigmatic role in the conquest tradition.' (p.274-275). It is difficult to know if too much is being read into the language here to produce a 'contradiction' or not. But the symbolic role of Jericho seems to be confirmed.

²⁰⁷ Ibid, p.274.

The status of chapter 24 within the book of Joshua is ambivalent because it so closely parallels the function of chapter 23 in the plot structure. Without ever dismissing the assembly of chapter 23, Joshua assembles them again. His anticipated death, which prompts chapter 23 (vv.1, 14), takes place only after this second gathering (24:29), which is provided with no additional narrative motivation. There is topical overlap between the two chapters: survey of the past (23:3-5, 9-10; 24:2-13), imperative and exhortation (23:6-13; 24:14-15), and the “Yahweh alone” ideology (23:7, 12, 16; 24:2, 14-24, 27). In genre, however, they are rather different. Chapter 23 is a call for obedience to the law and separation from the nations in the form of a testament, while chapter 24 is a challenge to serve (that is, worship) Yahweh crafted in the form of a dialogue. While chapter 23 directs Israel how to worship Yahweh (exclusively, vv.7-8, 16), the question in chapter 24 is not so much how, as who ought to be worshiped, and the answer is a resounding “Yahweh.” Chapter 23 works well as a summary to the book of Joshua, limiting its review to the occupation of the land. Chapter 24, in contrast, seems designed as a conclusion for the Hexateuch as a whole. It is less focused on the issue of land and operates with a wider horizon, one that includes patriarchs, exodus, and wilderness. Perhaps 23:16, which pulls together the themes of serving other gods, covenant, and the possibility of perishing from the land, served as the topical attachment point for chapter 24, which focuses on these same matters.²⁰⁸

Moreover, he suggests that the review in Josh. 24 is designed to ‘pilot both audience and reader to a climactic decision for Yahweh’.²⁰⁹

Whatever their relative origins and historical relationship to the rest of Joshua, the juxtaposition of Josh. 23 with 24 in the final form is complementary and indeed ‘synergistic’ as together the two chapters play off and enhance each other to witness to and clarify the identity of Israel in terms of her response to YHWH. Butler suggests that Josh. 24 gives ‘the theological definition of the people of God’ and that it is ‘one of the most important chapters in the OT for biblical theologians’. Significantly, he notes that it is atemporal; ‘It sets itself up as an occasion which has validity for all Israel through all time. ... It belongs to no specific time and thus to all times’,²¹⁰ and thus has clear existential importance. He detects several similarities between Josh. 23 and 24 in that they both provide:

1. An opening survey of history leading to conclusions for present behaviour;
2. Descriptions of the consequences of disobedience;
3. Calls for total allegiance to YHWH.

and several differences:

1. In Josh. 23 the setting is temporal, whilst in Josh. 24 it is geographical;

²⁰⁸ Ibid, p.268.

²⁰⁹ Ibid, p.269.

²¹⁰ Butler, Joshua, p.278. Cf. Origen’s comments on this passage in Exhortation to Martyrdom 17 (in ACCS, p.96): ‘Therefore, what Joshua said to the people when he settled them in the holy land, the Scripture might also say now to us.’

2. In Josh. 23 past history centres on the allotment of the land, whereas in Josh. 24 it centres on the victories of YHWH;
3. In Josh. 23 allegiance to YHWH is expressed by obedience to the book of the law, whereas in Josh. 24 it is through serving YHWH;
4. In Josh. 23 disobedience is exemplified by intermarriage, whereas in Josh. 24 it is exemplified by the worship of foreign gods;
5. Josh. 23 is a farewell speech of a dying leader whereas Josh. 24 is a ceremonial dialogue between leader and representatives.²¹¹

Thus Josh. 23-24 offer two complementary perspectives of the characterization of Israel; Israel's identity is based upon the action of YHWH on her behalf, on her 'choosing' to serve YHWH, and of her serving YHWH through obedience to torah and separation from other nations and their gods. Thus the worship of foreign gods and intermarriage are drawn together, with each symbolizing the other. Likewise 'serving YHWH' is associated with obedience to the book of the law, where again each idea says something more about the other, ideas which may, furthermore, be drawn into association with the idea of worship. Together, these notions reflect what is at the heart of Israelite identity and self-understanding, concerns that have resonated throughout the book and give further content to what Josh. 23-24 means.

Robert Polzin stresses the importance of YHWH's first-person presentation in the narrative, with Josh. 24:2-13 being 'God's autobiographical account of the significance of his previous relations with Israel'.²¹² He suggests that

The special nature of this interpretation [of the events that make up an account of Israel's past relationship with God], glossing over as it does not only the Mosaic covenant but also Israel's numerous past violations of that covenant, is that this is the only example of God's direct narrative explanation of the significant aspects of his past dealings with Israel. And God's explanation, in contradistinction to Moses' countless rehearsals of the events that preceded his speeches at Moab as well as Joshua's and the Deuteronomic narrator's many narrative explanations in the Book of Joshua, gives no special status to law and covenant in the depiction of Israel's essential relationship to God. Rather, what God emphasizes here is the unmerited nature of Israel's blessings, culminating in the gift of the land (24:13).²¹³

So Josh. 24:2-13 emphasizes God's calling and care of Israel, how Israel's identity is constituted by God's action on her behalf, culminating in Israel having been brought safely into the promised land and established there. But what follows is not Joshua's interpretation 'obviously go[ing] beyond what the words of God say',²¹⁴ but rather an exhortation based upon 24:2-13, an exhortation that 24:2-13 has been crafted to lead the reader toward. Indeed, ועתה (cf. Josh. 24:14) is used in 'deuteronomic orations' to move from a historical survey to a contemporary situation, or, more generally, as a 'transition from a parable to the moral lesson that is to be drawn from it'.²¹⁵ Thus recognizing the rhetorical nature of the material in Josh. 24 is crucial, and so Josh. 24:2-13 need not be a 'historical creed' per se, but a particular recital designed to evoke a particular response. It is good rhetoric, which may explain the absence of references to covenants, as we shall now see.

²¹¹ Butler, Joshua, pp.265-266.

²¹² Polzin, Moses, p.142.

²¹³ Ibid, p.143.

By commencing the speech in 24:2-13 with the story of Abraham who worshipped other gods, but whom YHWH led out from the land beyond the river, and concluding the speech with Israel's safe possession of the promised land, all at YHWH's initiative, it shows YHWH's favour and gracious calling of Israel; she owes her existence entirely to him. But, rhetorically speaking, precisely because of this 'grace', the possibility of a reversal is implied; this sequence of events can be 'undone' by YHWH too. Choosing YHWH and serving him (24:14ff) is the response that will be sought, a response that will lead to continued enjoyment of and blessing in the land, whereas choosing to worship idols and other gods will lead to an 'undoing', a return to the worship of other gods 'beyond the river', outside the land, where Abraham started. Indeed, Abraham is described as living 'beyond the river' (בְּעֵבֶר הַנָּהָר) (24:2), i.e., 'on the other side', a notion that has key symbolic significance, as we have seen; those 'on the other side' are the 'outsiders', whilst those living in the land symbolize the insiders, that is, those who belong to Israel. Joshua suggests that what makes people 'outsiders' here is serving other gods, which is precisely what Joshua has warned Israel against previously (23:16). Thus in 24:2-13, YHWH brings Abraham into Canaan, in other words bringing him to the status of an 'insider', whilst the description of the Amorites as living 'on the other side of the Jordan' (24:8) links them with those who lived 'on the other side of the river' as outsiders.²¹⁶ Thus the characteristics of the insider and outsider are displayed; Abraham is the paradigmatic (or symbolic) ‘insider’, whilst the Amorites are the paradigmatic outsiders. By knowing what Abraham and the Amorites are like one discovers what insiders and outsiders are like, and thus, positively and negatively, what Israelites ought to be like.

²¹⁴ Cf. Ibid, p.143.

²¹⁵ Weinfeld, Deuteronomy, p.175.

This rhetoric and characterization would explain why there is no interest in the law, or indeed of any covenant in 24:2-13, such as the covenant with Abraham, for what is stressed here is YHWH’s unilateral action on behalf of Israel, that it is gracious, but also with the implication that he can simply ‘undo’ all this history and return Israel to a pre-Abrahamic existence.²¹⁷ This is powerful rhetoric that calls for Israel’s response in what follows; whatever Israel has done or failed to do before, here, now is the point where response and mutual commitment enters. For if Israel does not respond appropriately now then ‘I’ (YHWH) will return you to a ‘pre-Abrahamic’ existence.²¹⁸ So perhaps Israel is to see herself ‘as Abraham’ here; Israel is to respond to God as Abraham did. Moreover, with Joshua set in a conquest scenario then perhaps there is a sense in which the narrative evokes a picture in which the kind of things that happened in the conquest will happen in reverse to Israel if they forsake YHWH. Indeed, “Serving YHWH” signifies acceptance of the distinctive destiny articulated by YHWH’s version of Israel’s story. “Serving other gods,” on the other hand, signifies a return to a pre-Israel state (v.2) and the rejection of all that YHWH has done for the nation. The people initially respond by endorsing YHWH’s rendition of their story and proclaiming, in both negative and positive terms, their decision to serve YHWH (vv.16-18). Joshua’s shocking rejoinder, however, ostensibly short-circuits the connection just forged between God and nation (vv.19-20). ... This refutation brings the forward momentum of the episode to an unexpected halt but also produces three significant rhetorical effects. First, it reminds the reader of the consequences of this decision and thus of all future decisions. The choice before Israel is a serious one, and dire consequences will follow if the people of Israel reject the God who has chosen them. Second, it establishes the genuine character of the people’s response by prompting them to repeat their decision to serve YHWH (v.21). Not even their leader’s rebuke will dissuade them from their decision to serve YHWH! Finally, Joshua’s repudiation of the people’s commitment implicitly reinforces the point of YHWH’S narrative preamble (vv.2-13); ultimately Israel's existence as a people depends more on what YHWH does than on what Israel does. In choosing YHWH, the people affirm their identity as a nation formed by YHWH (vv.17-18a), but this does not mean that what they do keeps the community intact.²¹⁹ So Joshua's 'shocking rejoinder' (24:19) accentuates the rhetorical nature of this dialogue. Perhaps a fuller and more serious realization of the character of YHWH and what serving him entails is achieved via the rather shocking 'delayed' response.²²⁰ It serves to highlight the difficulty of the existential choice that is to be made, or rather the difficulty in following through with the positive choice for YHWH because of the demanding nature of serving YHWH, even if it is the only choice that makes sense.

²¹⁶ Hawk, Joshua, pp.269-270.

²¹⁷ It is unclear precisely what YHWH does in sending the צרעה here (24:12). Traditionally it has been translated as hornet (cf. LXX σφηκαῖ), but Butler notes that most modern commentators now render צרעה as scourge, terror or discouragement (Joshua, p.264).

²¹⁸ Moreover, Hess notes that יצב (hithpaal) occurs in Josh. 24:1 and Ex. 19:17, where the people stand before Sinai (Joshua, p.300). So perhaps there is an allusion to Sinai and the giving of the law here, but it is evoked in relation to the response that the people are to make now, rather than in the context of a recital of YHWH’s previous dealings with Israel.

Geography is symbolic, and theologically important in Josh. 24. Shechem, the location of the ceremony, is a site that evokes choosing, and in particular it is the place where Israel (Jacob) 'put away' foreign gods (Gen. 35:1-4).²²¹ Indeed, Joshua's command in Josh. 24:23 is a verbatim repetition of Gen. 35:2.²²² Thus Josh. 24 may be interpreted in the light of Gen. 35. Moreover, Hawk suggests that Shechem also recalls the rape of Dinah, a story concerned with intercourse with peoples of the land and their extermination (Gen. 34:1-31).²²³ But it is interesting that Gen. 34 is, like Joshua, concerned with the construction of Israel's identity, where questions regarding the role of land (and how it is to be obtained), circumcision and ethnicity are raised. But the kind of answers given in Gen. 34 and Joshua are rather different, highlighted when the narratives are read from a neo-structuralist perspective, for Gen. 34 seeks to show that Israel's identity is constructed purely on ethnic grounds,²²⁴ whereas Joshua has sought to qualify precisely this notion.²²⁵ Identity in Josh. 24 is constructed by choosing to serve YHWH, and putting away idols and foreign gods, and so here, even at the narrative level we find material that readily resonates with the construction of Christian identity.²²⁶ But, as we ²¹⁹ Hawk, Joshua, p.264. He adds in a footnote that 'The people declare their intention to serve and obey (v.24), but the narrator does not report that they put away the foreign gods as Joshua has (now twice) commanded. The absence of the report is noteworthy because, throughout the book, the narrator confirms obedience to Joshua's command by reporting the precise execution of the command.' (p.265).

²²⁰ Perhaps cf. Ex. 3:13-15.

²²¹ Hawk, Joshua, p.261.

²²² Creach, Joshua, p.119.

²²³ Hawk, Joshua, p.261.

²²⁴ Cf. Kunin, We Think What We Eat, pp.181-185.

²²⁵ Moreover, Josh. 9 provides a series of ironic reversals to Gen. 34 as we saw previously.

²²⁶ And this is indeed what one finds in the patristic materials, e.g. Origen, Exhortation to Martyrdom 17, in ACCS, pp.95-96; Athanasius, Life of St. Anthony 20, in ACCS, p.96.

have seen more generally, what Joshua demonstrates is that ethnic identity does not finally determine Israel,²²⁷ and it thus implicitly qualifies the construction of identity in Gen. 34, a concern that resonates throughout Joshua.

Josh. 24 forms a fitting conclusion to Joshua. It shows that it is a book addressed to Israel concerned with the way that she is to relate to YHWH. It demonstrates the need for a positive choice to serve YHWH to be made, and to put away idols and foreign gods. What this means has been spelled out in Josh. 23 in homily, and developed in story in the rest of the book; Achan is one who fails to 'choose YHWH' whilst Rahab is one who chooses YHWH, with both stories indicating, in different ways, the demanding nature of this choice.

²²⁷ Cf. Hawk: The narrative indicates that Israel is 'unique among all other peoples only because YHWH has brought it into being and shaped it through experiences of rescue and gift' and that 'By setting ... two alternatives before the nation and the reader, Joshua therefore powerfully demonstrates that choosing YHWH is at the heart of what it means to be "Israel" (Joshua, p.263).

Chapter 9
Drawing it all together:
Reading Joshua as Christian Scripture today

9.1 Joshua – challenging and constructing identity

The significance of חָרָם in the construction of identity

I would like to begin by discussing the significance of חָרָם in Joshua, being a, if not the, major theme of the book, and indicate how it relates to the construction of identity through the interplay of the structural and narrative level concerns as identified by neo-structuralism. We saw in chapter 6 how Josh. 23-24 offered something like a ‘commentary’ that indicated what kinds of way the חָרָם injunctions of Deut. 7 were to find continuing significance and be enacted by Israel; חָרָם was to be enacted, but in a sense of ‘separation’, primarily so as to remain loyal to YHWH and not be led into the worship of other gods and idolatry. Indeed, in structuralist perspective, חָרָם in this sense indicates the denial of ‘mediation’. So, whilst it is described ‘literally’ in texts such as Deut. 7 and Josh. 6-11 – in the ‘world of the text’ – its significance in the ‘real world’ derives from its ‘second-order’ symbolic sense; in Josh. 23-24 the injunction to destroy idols and altars as per Deut. 7:5 is not even mentioned.¹ Thus one might say that Joshua provides, through Josh. 23-24, a ‘liminal transition’ that bridges the gap between the ‘mythical’, prototypical world of the text to the everyday world of the Israelite, indicating what it means to enact חָרָם via the existential contours drawn by its narration in Joshua. But I suggested in chapter 6, and we saw in chapter 8, that חָרָם is used in Joshua as something like a ‘literary device’ that goes beyond the idea of separation, and indeed challenges it as it was traditionally understood. This is, in fact, the main locus for the significance of חָרָם in Joshua, a suggestion that I shall now develop.

¹ This is not to say that Israel did not engage in warfare (this is another issue), and of course the destruction of idols and altars is something that is important in Kings. But these are questions for another day. Here, I merely wish to draw attention to Joshua.

One might say that the stories in Josh. 2-11 reflect a 'confrontation' with חרם – either with the command, the objects, or the effects of it. Rahab, when confronted with חרם, realized the power of YHWH and that he was 'with Israel', and thus that she would need 'rescuing' from the חרם, and demonstrated through her 'speeches' an awareness of who YHWH was in a 'confession' that matched that of Moses (Deut. 4:39) and Solomon (1 Kg. 8:23), and demonstrated in her actions of חסד that she is characterized by the very qualities that are at the heart of the covenant between YHWH and Israel (2:10-12), despite being a Canaanite prostitute. Achan is Rahab's foil. He is the model ethnic Israelite, but when confronted with חרם he coveted (חמד) it, and when asked to give glory to YHWH, whilst 'confessing his sin', he failed to glorify YHWH (7:19-21). So, despite appearances, in Rahab's case the confrontation with חרם 'draws out' her nature as 'Israel', whilst in Achan's case the confrontation draws out his nature as 'non-Israel', as symbolic constructs.

Similarly, when confronted with חרם various local kings react aggressively to the Israelites (9:1-2, 10:1-5, 11:1-5). This 'confirms' their status as non-Israelite, as hostile towards YHWH and Israel, contrasting with Rahab. But perhaps these paradigmatic 'outsiders' who are confirmed as such through their aggression also contrast with Joshua, the 'insider' who is confirmed as a paradigmatic insider through obedience to YHWH exemplified in responding obediently to the חרם command, and in being fully obedient to torah.² Indeed, the portrayal of Joshua is unusual in the Old Testament as seldom are characters portrayed so unambiguously; Abraham, Moses and David have ambiguous portrayals for example. But here his 'unswervingly positive' portrayal marks Joshua out as the model Israelite, a hero and role model. But beyond this, Joshua's positive portrayal provides a lens through which to interpret some of the more ambiguous episodes in ² G.M.H Ratheiser, Mitzvoth Ethics and the Jewish Bible: The End of Old Testament Theology (Library of Hebrew Bible/Old Testament Studies 460) (London: T&T Clark, 2007), pp.268ff who argues that Joshua is portrayed as an 'exemplary warrior'.

Joshua, such as the oaths with Rahab and the Gibeonites, suggesting a positive appraisal of these.

But what about the Gibeonites? They do not respond aggressively, and, like Rahab, they realize the unstoppable power of YHWH and that he is with Israel, and that they need 'rescuing' from חרם. But they do not give the glory to YHWH as Rahab does (2:10-11); they offer no confession, simply fearing for their lives. They do not demonstrate חסד but rather ערמה, which is, I think, to be construed positively (and ironically in the light of Gen. 34), but does not constitute the heart of the covenant in the way that חסד does, and so they do not exhibit the true fundamental characteristics of Israelite identity.³ They are spared, but become servants of Israel. Thus they have a 'liminal' status; their portrayal does not characterize them as being genuinely Israelite or non-Israelite, and remain so in their status as servants, being not quite truly 'insiders' or 'outsiders'. But it is noteworthy that חרם does not appear in Josh. 9 unlike all the other stories, which might suggest that the 'test' of confrontation with חרם is unable to reveal fully one's identity in all cases - חרם is absent in the Gibeonite case because it fails to indicate their nature and identity.⁴ Moreover, since in neo-structuralist perspective the Gibeonites represent mediators - having the qualities of both 'Israel' and 'non-Israel', and since חרם represents the denial of the possibility of mediation, then its absence is not surprising, and draws attention to the awkward liminal status of the Gibeonites.

³ The story reflects an ironic reversal of Gen. 34 in which it was deception (ערמה) that characterized the Israelites. So the Gibeonites are in a sense 'Israel', but perhaps not Israel in their finest hour.

⁴ Such an understanding of חרם as 'test' is, I think, supported by the other main extended חרם narrative, where חרם is commanded in extreme form, 1 Sam. 15. Here, Samuel brings the word of the Lord to Saul, where Saul is required to annihilate the Amalakites and all their animals. But Saul spares the best of the animals (perhaps indicating covetousness again, although the text does not spell this out), and suffers judgement accordingly. The extreme חרם serves a rhetorical function to sharpen the test; how will one respond in the most demanding circumstances (limit-situations), i.e., amid genocide and riches?

What is interesting about all these stories is the absence of evaluation. But some of these stories sit uncomfortably with Deut. 7 & 20, and so perhaps the evaluation is left for the reader to supply, whilst being guided (implicitly) toward a particular conclusion by the narrator in order to challenge some of the assumptions of Deuteronomy.⁵ It is almost as if the reader or the community is confronted by the same $\square\aleph$ 'test' as the characters in the story; how do I/we respond to these narratives? Is it right that the stories resolve in the way that they do? The stories of Josh. 2-11 set up a matrix of 'test cases' that develops the identity of Israel and her relations with outsiders, perhaps 'pushing' the conventional understanding of what it means to be Israel: The 'model outsiders' confirmed as outsiders through their aggression (the hostile kings); the 'model outsider' who doubles as an 'insider' (Rahab); the 'model insider' confirmed as the insider through torah obedience (Joshua), and the 'model insider' who is shown to be an 'outsider' (Achan). These identities are 'drawn out' through response to $\square\aleph$, stories that together seek to redefine Israel, moving away from a solely genealogical identity to one in which character, actions, attitude, and disposition towards YHWH (qualities that were also to define Israel (cf. Deut. 6-11) alongside ethnicity), became more determinative, eclipsing ethnicity, something that will set the 'frame of reference' for Christian identity. But, lest one think that identity definition is straightforward and boundary maintenance easy, the reader is confronted with the Gibeonites, whose story seems to probe ambiguous and difficult questions of identity at the boundary, and refuse easy resolutions.

What these stories represent, at the structural level, is the probing and pushing of the underlying structure that relates to insider : outsider relationships. Is transformation or mediation possible? Joshua represents an attempt to push the underlying structure through ways that are given content at the narrative level, even if it is a narrative that is not to be appropriated in any straightforward sense as 'a model to follow', as Victor

⁵ Or, perhaps, Joshua might indicate what they 'really meant' – myths need to be interpreted in juxtaposition with other myths. Robert Polzin argues that Joshua presents interpretations of the Mosaic law (R. Polzin, Moses and the Deuteronomist: A Literary Study of the Deuteronomic History (New York: The Seabury Press, 1980), e.g. pp.126, 144), whilst Daniel Hawk argues that Joshua portrays violations of the law (L.D. Hawk, Every Promise Fulfilled: Contesting Plots in Joshua (Louisville: Westminster John Knox Press, 1991), pp.44-47). But in canonical perspective, whatever the original intent, what Joshua represents is now interpretation.

Turner's approach to myth highlights, along with careful consideration of what narrative elements are actually serving structural requirements.

Thus the significance of חרם in Joshua is that in the world of the text it functions as the basis of a 'test' that reveals 'true' identity – not with respect to violence and genocide, but with respect to response to YHWH. In doing so it qualifies the way in which Deut. 7 is to be construed, and what it means to 'practise' חרם. The narratives do then, in fact, function so as to qualify the accepted traditional understanding of Israelite identity, rather than to reinforce xenophobia or violence, whilst using the traditional grammars of discourse to do so, with the narratives challenging what, at the surface level, one expects חרם to be about.⁶

Characteristics of Israelite Identity – character traits

Having considered how חרם functions largely at the structural level to construct identity, I would now like to consider how such identity is given content through narrative level concerns. However, an appreciation of the mythical nature of Joshua, especially as construed in Victor Turner's terms, urges caution in using Joshua as a model for behaviour in a straightforward way, especially with regard to חרם. Indeed, the reading above suggests that חרם in Joshua is essentially a literary motif serving structural requirements that is cast in the narrative as an interpretation and fulfilment of Deut. 7 in the prototypical world of the text,⁷ with Josh. 23-24 indicating the way in which Deut. 7 is to be enacted by the reader – separation, but an enactment that is read through Josh. 2-

⁶ Cf. E.F. Davis, 'Critical Traditioning: Seeking an Inner Biblical Hermeneutic', in ATR 82:4 (2000), pp.733-751, and L.G. Stone, 'Ethical and Apologetic Tendencies in the Redaction of the Book of Joshua', in CBQ 53:1 (2004), pp.25-36. I am not convinced that this is something traceable in the redaction of Joshua per se, rather, it is in Joshua's response to the deuteronomistic tradition. However, I think that in light of the slightly differing focus of Josh. 1, 21:43-45, 23 & 24 from the rest of the material that it is possible to posit these as later additions to a relatively stable book, additions that develop and extend the significance of the remainder of the material in light of Deut. 7. But these additions ought to be construed as developing the text, rather than distorting it, for, as I have indicated, they provide fitting commentary on the material in light of the juxtaposition of Joshua with the Pentateuch.

⁷ I.e., whilst Joshua presents itself as the fulfilment of Deut. 7, it is in fact doing more than this, challenging and developing the deuteronomistic assumptions of Deut. 7.

12 which indicates that it is not simply ethnic non-Israelites that Israel is to be separate from;⁸ rather, the Rahabs may be welcomed into the community but the Achans expelled with others (Gibeonites) awkwardly on the margins.

Moreover, woven in to the narrative are the portrayals of characteristics that give content to the underlying structural categories that Joshua reflects; Joshua and the Israelites' obedience and Rahab's response of סָמַח (positively), and Achan's covetousness, lying and disobedience, together with the local kings' aggression (negatively). The characteristics that exemplify Israelite identity are given further content in Josh. 13-21, where one discovers the importance of boldness, zeal and initiative. But these are not autonomous qualities in a vacuum; they are exercised in response to YHWH's promise and gift, being what is required to appropriate the gift (e.g. Caleb). But these stories also challenge assumptions of patriarchy. Land is granted to Achsah, and to Zelophedad's daughters; like Rahab, they respond well to YHWH, showing initiative and boldness, exhibiting Israelite qualities. These character traits are not opposed to humility, for they are not autonomous; rather, they express action based on trust in YHWH's promises.

The exercise of these qualities and characteristics is shown to lead to blessing and 'rest' in the land, whereas the exercise of covetousness, stealing, lying and disobedience is shown to lead to expulsion and death, and to the 'contamination' of the community, highlighting the corporate effects of such sin, when read in priestly perspective.

Characteristics of Israelite Identity - land

Whilst the stories of Josh. 2-21 indicate in complementary ways what is to characterize the people of Israel, often in surprising ways, Josh. 22 provides a further surprise, concerning the relationship between identity and the land. Just as Josh. 2-11 pushes Israel's identity beyond genealogy, so Josh. 22 seems to push her identity beyond geography. Josh. 22 indicates that the land is not finally central to the identity of Israel.⁹

⁸ In other words, Joshua develops two kinds of interpretation of Deut. 7, one in 2-12, another in 23-24 that are to be taken together.

⁹ As I argued in chapter 8, I do not think that this is an extension of the land and the bounds of its purity, but rather a qualification of the concept itself.

According to Josh. 22 one can live outside the land and still be a true Israelite, living faithfully and obeying torah. But the land does symbolize life with YHWH in its fullness, something that is ‘made concrete’ through the covenant and the blessing of a fertile land. Indeed, the Jordan river is an important boundary, and crossing it (עבר) is a powerful symbol for entering into life in the community of Israel. Such ‘crossing’ symbolizes moving into life in its fullness, enjoying life with YHWH through the covenant and enjoying the fruitfulness and blessing of the land that YHWH provides.

Summary

In summary then, whilst reinforcing some aspects of Israelite identity, such as the centrality of obedience to YHWH and practice of כסדר, Joshua simultaneously challenges accepted views of what it is that constitutes Israelite identity by urging caution against seeking to define the boundaries of the community too carefully and thus demonstrating an open-ness to the ‘outsider’ whilst encouraging a searching exploration of the attitudes of those considered to be inside the community. Thus whilst Joshua encourages the enactment of חרם in terms of separation, it offers an unexpected perspective on the nature of such separation, i.e. just whom it is that faithful Israel should and should not seek to keep separate from.

9.2 Appropriating Joshua – the development and use of its symbols and mythemes

I would now like to consider how the symbolism of Joshua has been and can be appropriated and developed in the tradition of its use in ways that reflect its mythical nature, in particular via the construction of ‘new myths’ as Joshua is used in juxtaposition with other ‘myths’, thus forming the cultural memory of the community that values the text.¹⁰ Here, my primary concern is the development of the symbolism of the text at the narrative level, and of how this relates to the construction of identity in ways complementary with those in 9.1. In reading the text in this way here I do not wish to make metaphysical claims in the way that (especially) traditional Christian readings tended to, but rather to indicate the kind of way in which the text, read and used as myth, provides an imaginative resource for the Christian life that does, 'as testimony', ultimately 'gesture towards' the metaphysical nature of life in Christ for the Christian.

¹⁰ That is, the use made of a text by a community is a vital aspect of its interpretation, and might be said to lead to the development of ‘new myth’, that, theologically speaking, might be said to be ‘revelatory’ in itself.

Crossing the Jordan and resting in the Land

The significance of the symbolism of crossing the Jordan, and of the land, is developed in IQS, and further in the traditional Christian typologies of baptism, where the symbolism is imaginatively, constructively and fittingly appropriated, exploring its plenitude to serve a new cultural context. It is fitting since its use in this way reflects the sorts of concern of Joshua as an act of discourse, that it relates to entry into new life. Joshua highlights the symbolic rather than ontological nature of the land, and relates to life with YHWH in its fullness. The remainder of Joshua gives content to some aspects of what this life entails.

We have seen that נָחַם (rest) reflects a desire and goal of the occupation of the land, although it is something that Josh. 23-24 indicates is something that one is ever moving toward, via 'choosing YHWH', obeying torah, and separating oneself entirely from idolatry. There is thus an incipient eschatological impulse in Joshua. But the language of battle and conquest that pervades Joshua indicates that this rest is not easily achieved; it is only reached through demanding obedience and struggle. Ironically then, the vocabulary of combat is required to evoke the demanding nature of the life that is required to lead to 'rest', and the realization of the enjoyment of life with YHWH in its fullness. Indeed, Rowan Williams remarks, in the context of feminist interpretation, that 'the importance of contemporary feminist exegesis [is] an example of disturbing scriptural reading which forces on us the 'conversion' of seeing how our own words and stories may carry sin or violence in their telling, even as they provide the resource for overcoming that sin and violence'.¹¹ In other words, whilst stories such as Joshua 'may carry sin or violence in their telling' they may also 'provide the resource for overcoming that sin and violence'.

¹¹ R. Williams, 'The Judgement of the World', in On Christian Theology (Oxford: Blackwell, 2000), pp.29-43, here p.42.

It is therefore natural to expect the 'spiritual' reading of Joshua to develop in the way that it did, where life in the Promised Land typifies the spiritual life, but also that the metaphors needed to describe existentially the spiritual life retain a 'militaristic' nature, such as in Eph. 6:10-18. However, when reading Joshua as myth, when it is juxtaposed with other myths that arise in the Christian tradition, then the idea of desiring rest in Joshua finds resonances with Augustine's notion of the soul seeking rest in God.¹² As the Promised Land symbolizes life with God, as we have seen, the imagery of Joshua becomes a potent one for the struggle to find rest in God. But in the tradition this struggle becomes 'internalized'; the battle is no longer 'out there' with 'the righteous against the wicked', but inside.¹³ In Christian terminology the struggle is worked out through crucifixion of the self with and in Christ. Traditionally, such combat is drawn in to the domain of asceticism,¹⁴ and indeed Olivier Clément suggests that, 'Ascesis means exercise, combat. 'Spiritual combat, harder than men's battles' Ascesis then is an awakening from the sleep-walking of daily life. It enables the Word to clear the silt away in the depth of the soul, freeing the spring of living waters.'¹⁵ Together, Augustine and Clément point towards what constitutes rest and how one finds it in the Christian life – through (internalized) combat, with Joshua providing an imaginative symbolic resource for this difficult process. This desire – to find rest in God – is something that Joshua is expressive of, and is developed in new ways in the Christian tradition, using texts such as Joshua as an imaginative resource.

מלחמה and conquest symbolism

A rather demanding existential appropriation of the מלחמה symbolism in the Christian context might be that it becomes a symbol for the conflict against idolatry that is directed

¹² Cf. Ellen Charry's comments on St. Augustine: 'Prayer and piety are the way to rest in God, and resting in God is finally the way to a wholesome self; resting in self brings at best happy moments. The goal of life is rest in God. Once the soul understands itself called to "remember its God to whose image it was made, and understand[s] and love[s] him [it is] able to share in him. . . . [It] will reign in happiness where it reigns eternal" ([De Trinitate] xiv:4:15)'. ('Dwelling in the Dignity of God: Augustine of Hippo', in By the Renewing of your Minds: The Pastoral Function of Christian Doctrine (Oxford: OUP, 1997), pp.120-152, here p.147) Augustine might then point forward to a fruitful theological development of the kind of 'rest' envisaged in Joshua for a Christian reader.

¹³ Cf. Mark 7:1-23.

¹⁴ See O. Clément, The Roots of Christian Mysticism: Text and Commentary (London: New City, ET 2nd ed.: 1994) in which one major section of the book is titled 'Initiation for Warfare' to describe the Christian life.

¹⁵ Ibid., p.130.

against the self. Just as one might imaginatively evoke the powerful Jordan symbolism in baptism, so one might imaginatively evoke the חרם symbolism in the call to the crucified life. In a sense this reflects more a development of Deut. 7 rather than Joshua per se (cf. 9.1). But reading canonically in juxtaposition with other myths and their development, חרם is used in various ways in the Old Testament. Apart from occasional anomalous usages there is a 'deuteronomic-חרם', a 'priestly-חרם', and an 'eschatological-חרם' (cf. chapter 6). Broadly speaking, the juxtaposition and fusion of these conceptions of חרם may be suggestive of the imaginative appropriation of חרם in a Christian context by way of engaging with the crucifixion, where perhaps one could say that חרם finds a 'literal' manifestation; where the eschaton breaks into history.¹⁶ As Jesus' crucifixion represents the annihilation of, let us say idolatry (construed in its broad Christian sense), in order to establish the kingdom of God so that rest may be found with God, then the crucifixion is in some ways analogous to the prototypical event of the conquest for which חרם is the category used to interpret it. So, might one say that by, in some sense, 'bearing the idolatry' of the world Jesus becomes an abomination to be destroyed ('my God, my God, why have you forsaken me ...'), reflecting deuteronomic-חרם, whilst simultaneously being the holy one irrevocably given over to, and set apart for God in his death, reflecting the priestly-חרם?¹⁷ If so, then to use the traditional Christian grammar, one could say that חרם finds 'fulfilment' on the cross, even though the means of such 'fulfilment' is quite unexpected, albeit one that resonates with Isa. 53.¹⁸

But, for the Christian, a sharp reinterpretation of the nature of defilement, idolatry and the means of dealing with them is suggested in the New Testament in Mark 7:14-23 for example; it is not that which is external that defiles and leads to idolatry, but that which is within. Hence a sharp reinterpretation of the nature of אֱלֹהִים is required; it is not to be directed against that which is external, but to that which is internal. For the Christian, the image of destruction of the external polluting influence is replaced with that of annihilation of idolatry in the self, conducted in part through ascetic struggle.¹⁹ Idolatry is overcome not by the avoidance or destruction of what is other, but by the crucifying of the self through participation in Christ.

¹⁶ Cf. 'Christ takes upon himself the sin of the world and becomes the victim of the holy war that God wages against sin (2 Cor. 5:21).' (R.S. Hess, Joshua (TOTC) (Leicester: IVP, 1996), p.46).

¹⁷ This kind of juxtaposition seems to lie behind the additions of Josh. 6:19 & 24.

¹⁸ As noted in chapter 7 it is interesting that early Christian reading of Joshua did not develop in this direction, probably because there was rather little interest from viewing the atonement from this kind of perspective.

Joshua and idolatry

Most of Joshua appears rather unconcerned with idolatry, but in Josh. 23-24, the problem of idolatry is raised in terms of the response that YHWH seeks. Idolatry remains a key concern in the New Testament context, and in the subsequent Christian tradition, even if it comes to be envisaged rather differently in the tradition than in ancient Israel. Whilst the understanding of the nature of idols and idolatry would seem to have undergone transformation, the transformation is, arguably, a clarification of the 'essence' of idolatry. To consider such development, it will be helpful to turn to Nicholas Lash, whose thinking can be organized around four key points: that idolatry essentially consists in the mistaking of creaturely for divine reality; that such mistaking is less a matter of explicit conceptual objectification and more of where the heart is set; that idolatry lives forgetful that God is no thing at all, any more than 'religion' pertains to any particular area of experience and practice; that there are significant resources intrinsic to the Christian tradition for supporting the long march from the captivating security of idolatry to the intensely challenging freedom of the children of God - indeed, that the Christian tradition is a school in which all are set to the slow learning of the ways of God in Christ and the Spirit.²⁰

In other words, 'putting away idols' today is as much as anything an existential process that is conducted via Christian discipleship, involving a kind of ascetic struggle perhaps, being a process learned within the church, as one participates in the worship and practices of the church.²¹ This call to discipleship is thus 'drawn in' to the demanding choice to follow YHWH, reflected today in following Christ.

¹⁹ I think that such asceticism may be construed broadly.

²⁰ P.D. Murray, 'Theology 'Under the Lash': Theology as Idolatry-Critique in the Work of Nicholas Lash', in S.C. Barton (ed), Idolatry: False Worship in the Bible, Early Judaism and Christianity (London: T&T Clark, 2007), pp. 246-266, pp. 254-255.

²¹ However, there is an important sense in which the church as a community is engaged in a continual ascetic struggle against idolatry given that the church has not yet reached perfection; Joshua is a book addressed to a community that challenges the community's self-understanding, whilst calling for response at the individual level too.

Conquest symbolism

The symbolism of the conquest may be used in other ways. For example, the well fortified, impregnable walls of Jericho collapse and the city is taken with ease after a procession around it in obedience to YHWH, but even the small ‘ruin’ of Ai proves too much for Israel after Achan’s disobedience. In other words the stories evoke the image of YHWH ‘fighting’ powerfully on one’s behalf when one obeys God, and thus that one need not fear apparent obstacles and difficulties in life when one is following God, but of a sense of ‘leaving one to one’s own devices and weaknesses’ when one disobeys.²² Achan’s story indicates that disobedience ‘contaminates’ the community, resulting in the withdrawal of God’s presence. But the rather cryptic Josh. 5:13-15, which functions as something of a prologue to Josh. 6-11 and the conquest, cautions against simply asking if God is on our side. Rather, the question needs to be redirected – have we aligned ourselves with God? If so, then one need not fear seemingly insurmountable obstacles, and the narratives of Joshua encourage one to see that YHWH is ‘fighting on one’s behalf’, but as the Mekhilta Shirata developed, YHWH fought on (Israel’s) behalf when in need.²³

Joshua and ‘salvation history’

I would now like to consider a very different kind of appropriation of Joshua, one that might be problematic for a mythical reading of it. Joshua draws attention to the settlement of the land as the fulfilment of YHWH’s promise (e.g. 21:44-45), a note that might add a more historical dimension to Joshua than I have sought to develop. Moreover, with the emergence of the canon in which Joshua was juxtaposed with other ‘historical’ or ‘history-like’ narratives, Joshua seems to acquire greater significance ‘as history’. Indeed, it seems that Judges was redacted to be read together with Joshua via the addition of Judg. 1:1-2:5 which supplies continuity and perhaps ‘harmonization’ of the two books so that they could be read as a continuous history, which, when read as a part of Genesis-Kings forms a larger continuous history of Israel from the creation of the world to the exile.²⁴ What emerges from this ‘grand historical narrative’ is a picture of a continuous history of God’s dealing with Israel, a history that develops into the New Testament, and might rightly be termed ‘salvation history’; i.e., it is a theological concept that probably developed relatively late as the community reflected on their existence and relationship to God through time.

²² Again, this can be construed in terms of the individual or the community.

²³ Cf. chapter 3 for discussion.

But, as I have indicated,²⁵ it is common for myths to ‘tire’ and to ossify over time, becoming objectified and historicized. Does this then suggest that to try to read Joshua as such a ‘history’ and to see it as part of an emerging ‘history of salvation’ is wrong footed? There are two issues here. First, by focusing on ‘history’ and ‘objectifying’ the text as a representation of past events it is possible (although not necessary) that the real existential significance of the text is obscured, with some of the searching and challenging ways in which Joshua seeks to shape response to God being obscured, leading to poor (and often, sadly, disastrous) use of the text. In other words, when historicized, it is possible to construe the text with the story being ‘out there in the past’ rather than being part of the reader’s present world. But secondly, an emerging concept of ²⁴ The importance of ‘history’ in this sort of sense is something that may have arisen as a result of, or alongside a Hellenistic concern for history, in which the importance of the concept developed. See J. van Seters, In Search of History: Historiography in the Ancient World and the Origins of Biblical History (Winona Lake: Eisenbrauns, 1997), p.8ff in relation to Greek historiography and pp.209-248 in relation to Israel. In particular he discusses Mowinckel’s view that Joshua and Judges filled a gap in an otherwise ‘complete’ history, supplementing the Yahwist (p.236). Moreover, van Seters suggests that the ‘fundamental problem of the Hexateuch is, perhaps, how to view Judg. 1:1-2:5 and its relation to what comes before and after it.’ (p.337); it is an intrusion in its present context (p.338). The possibility that this redacting and ‘harmonizing’ of the materials into a continuous history occurred, and was a concern, and that it occurred relatively late might find support in W.W. Hallo’s observation that in Judg. 1:15 Achsah ‘uses the Aramaism hāvā-lī (‘give me’), for ʾnā-lī (‘give me’), in Joshua [15:19]’. (W.W. Hallo, ‘New Light on the Story of Achsah’, in J. Kaltner & L. Stulman (eds), Inspired Speech: Prophecy in the Ancient Near East. Essays in honour of Herbert. B. Huffmon (London: T&T Clark, 2004), pp.330-335, here, p.330). John Strange argues that ‘in view of the ingenious way that the Book of Joshua is interwoven with the rest of the story [Gen. 11 – 2 Kg. 25] ... the Book of Joshua is an editorial ploy, a creation by an editor who by writing it turned the whole story from Gen 11 to 2 Kings 25 into a “Hasmonean Manifesto”, and at the same time made the Tetrateuch and the Deuteronomistic History into one single piece of historical literature’ (‘The Book of Joshua – Origin and Dating’, in SJOT 16/1 (2002), pp.44-51, here p.50). He argues for a very late (first century) date for this process (ibid, p.44). Whilst this process may not be as late as he suggests, (and it seems very unlikely to be this late, granted that 4QJosh^a is dated on palaeographic grounds to the second half of the second century BC (M.N. van der Meer, Formation and Reformulation: The Redaction of the Book of Joshua in the Light of the oldest Textual Witnesses (Leiden: Brill, 2004), p.95) the possibility that a redaction of materials into a harmonized history may have taken place relatively late might indeed reflect the rise of Greek historiography, and concerns with history (and perhaps their influence), as indicated by van Seters (History, pp.8ff).

²⁵ See chapters 2 and 3.

‘salvation history’ is really a ‘new myth’ that emerges as the result of the juxtaposition of a number of myths, being itself a ‘mythical conception’,²⁶ that says something new about God and his relationship with humanity; the world and the human race is understood as being directed, with a telos in view that is ‘in God’, a very existential concern. In other words, this kind of mythical development of the text pursues a narrow and interesting dialectic between the ‘tiring’ of a myth and its development in new ways, ways that are suggested in the text itself, such as Josh. 21:43–45. In other words, the emergence of the idea of ‘salvation history’ is a fitting exploration of the plenitude of the myth in a new context through juxtaposition with other myths and reflection on the history of the community.

Perhaps, however, in our context of raised historical consciousness some difficulties do emerge. I noted in chapter 3 that there were difficulties with von Rad’s credo and the way in which Ricoeur sought to appropriate it in his development of the idea of testimony. But I also indicated, with reference to Exodus, that even if there was never an exodus in anything like the form narrated, one may still regard Exodus as reflecting the discernment of a very real ‘exodus experience’ for Israel. Likewise, even if there was no conquest in anything like the way that Joshua relates,²⁷ the establishment of the worship of YHWH and the people of Israel in the land, however this actually occurred, might be seen as a ‘conquest experience’. When coupled with the ‘exodus experience’ and the hopes associated with it, one might discern a trajectory of hope/promise – exodus – settlement that has a historical shape and thus reflects a historical trajectory in which God engages with his people in a particular way, oriented to a particular telos. In other words, even with raised historical consciousness it is still possible to claim the idea of ‘salvation history’ with Exodus and Joshua reflecting key symbolic expressions of this history, even if the basis for the idea looks rather different now from what it did previously.

²⁶ This is, of course, not to say that it is not ‘real’, but a comment on the kind of discourse that it is and the way in which it emerged.

²⁷ See e.g. N.A. Soggie (Myth, God, and War: The Mythopoetic Inspiration of Joshua (Lanham: University Press of America, 2007), for discussion along these lines, and summary of the theories of the origins or emergence of Israel. Also see M. Weinfeld, The Promise of the Land: The Inheritance of the Land of Canaan by the Israelites (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1993), pp.99–120.

In summary then, whilst the ‘historicization’ of Joshua can certainly be a poor move, if interpreted well it may be seen as ‘revelatory’ in itself as Israel developed the prophetic realization of her role and of God’s relationship with her and with the world. When placed in canon Joshua becomes more a symbol of ‘history’ and helps establish an idea of salvation history, as part of a new act of discourse that expands the horizons of the original act of discourse.

9.3 Appropriating Joshua – its development and use as an act of discourse as myth

Whilst the uses of Joshua that I have considered in 9.2 reflect fitting developments of the plenitude of a number of aspects of its symbolism, being developments of what is inherent to the symbols, in a sense these are not serious developments of Joshua per se as an act of discourse, the nature of which I began to explore in 9.1. Indeed, I suggested in chapter 3 that it may be unhelpful to seek to construe Joshua’s Christian significance primarily in terms of addressing questions that might arise from the kind of analysis above like, ‘What does it mean to practice יְהוָה today?’, or ‘What does it mean to rid oneself of idols today?’, even though these are important questions. Rather, a larger frame of reference is needed that goes beyond the use of symbols at the narrative level in which the focus might instead be upon questions like, ‘What does it mean to respond faithfully to God today in the light of Joshua and what Joshua sought to achieve and show?’ This will naturally attract and involve the above questions, but they will not govern interpretation. Indeed, Joshua as discourse is concerned with probing difficult questions of identity and relationships, and it is in this regard that the יְהוָה symbolism as found in Joshua finds its main significance. This is not to say that it does not find significance in other ways too, as sketched above, which simply reflects the polyvalent nature of the text and symbol; provided the explorations of the plenitude of the text are ‘fitting’ both with regard to the text and its tradition of use then there is no difficulty in exploring the potential of the symbolism in various ways.

In a theological sense then, read through neo-structuralist categories, Joshua may be seen as a ‘preparation for the gospel’ in that it pushes the structure and categories of Israelite identity away from a genealogical identity in favour of an identity that is constituted by character and responsiveness to God,²⁸ implying the possibility of transformation from outsider to insider, or vice versa, something that the Old Testament tended to deny, but is something that is central to the New Testament and the gospel message. Indeed, in the Old Testament אֱלֹהִים, certainly in its deuteronomistic sense, is perhaps the paradigmatic category for denying mediation and transformation, whereas in the New Testament ‘faith’ is perhaps the paradigmatic category for expressing mediation and transformation, something that I shall return to below.

So in one sense Joshua could be said to find its Christian theological significance as being a preparation for the gospel, in that it prepares for the possibility of ‘conversion’ in the context of the ancient world, with its job completed in this context as something achieved, reaching its ‘end’ in the New Testament, even though it still affects us today, for Christians live in the light of its effects. Joshua might then be valued and cherished in the general sense of ‘cultural memory’ in that it provides the historical roots for the Christian community, providing the community with a narrative for its existence.²⁹ So in one sense at least Joshua’s significance is located in terms of pushing the perception of the identity of ‘true Israel’, to pave the way for the Messiah, who would transform ‘outsiders’ into the people of God, in a way that is described using the category of ‘faith’. But does Joshua continue to find significance beyond this, and beyond being a symbolic, imaginative resource as sketched in 9.2?

I think that Joshua’s significance does go further. First, one way of looking at the stories in Josh. 2-11 is to consider them as illustrating differing responses to what one might call, in the world of the text, ‘divine action in the world’ that is described using the ²⁸ This is not to say that character and responsiveness to God were not always important too (cf. Deut. 6-11); rather, it is to say that there was a sense in which ethnic identity may have eclipsed these, a situation that Joshua seeks to invert.

²⁹ Perhaps this is rather like some Antiochene construals of the Christian significance of the Old Testament, such as in Theodore of Mopsuestia in particular. Cf. D. Zaharopoulos, Theodore of Mopsuestia on the Bible: A Study of his Old Testament Exegesis (New York: Paulist Press, 1989); ‘Theodore’s final verdict was that the Old Testament taken on its own terms does not present Christ to us; it rather prepares the way for Jesus the messiah. ... [However he] was more than convinced that the Old Testament is the record which registers the initial dealings of God with his chosen people of Israel before he “spoke at the end of these days unto us in his Son.”’ (pp.183-184). Perhaps cf. Gal. 3:24-25 also.

category of מִרְיָה as something that symbolizes such divine action and demands a response; how one responds to divine action reflects one's identity. Such a concern is developed in John's gospel, in which Jesus can be said to be the ultimate instance of 'divine action in the world', response to which/whom is an act of self-judgment, either of coming to the light or remaining in darkness, to use John's categories. In other words, perhaps in the Christian context it is response to Jesus that re-expresses something of what Joshua sought to achieve in terms of response to מִרְיָה; response to Jesus manifests one's identity (cf. e.g. John 3:16-21) perhaps in unsettling ways in John in which the cherished centrality of 'Jewishness' in the construction of the identity of God's people is qualified yet further than in Joshua, and perhaps rejected altogether. This provides the first step toward recontextualizing Joshua as discourse by giving content to what (who) one must respond to.

Secondly, Joshua gives content to the kind of characteristics that are associated with faithful response, being יִשְׁמַע, obedience, initiative, zeal, boldness and trust in God.³⁰ Such characteristics find their trajectory developed into the New Testament and the Christian tradition, being worked out in love shown in action, faith and hope, courage and fortitude (to use the language of Christian virtue), indicated in the New Testament, such as in 1 Cor. 13, in the boldness of approaching God in Heb. 4:16, and the initiative, boldness and hope exemplified in the Canaanite woman who approached Jesus (Matt. 15:21-28).³¹

Thirdly, Joshua can continue to disturb accepted definitions of identity in the contemporary Christian context, when, for example, it is read in juxtaposition with Matt. 7:15-23 & 25:31-46 and the contemporary context. In today's Christian context 'confession' or 'belief' (construed cognitively) might be said to reflect the same kind of cherished essential characteristic of identity that replaces 'genealogy' in the ancient

³⁰ As suggested above, this kind of responsiveness can be developed at the community as well as the individual level, being the sort of responsiveness that is to characterize the church.

³¹ I.e., she responds faithfully to Jesus in the same kind of way that Rahab responds to מִרְיָה, both symbolizing divine action in the world.

Israelite context. But just as Joshua challenges the ‘genealogical essentialism’ of identity construction, so Matt. 7:15-23 & 25:31-46 might challenge the ‘confessional essentialism’ in a Christian context, in that deeds and dispositions are important, and explicit confession qualified. In both Joshua and Matthew, it is particular character traits and actions that are shown to be important in the construction of identity, something expressed also in James (Jas. 2:20-26) that has tended to be eclipsed in Protestant circles in particular by focusing, perhaps, on an arguably rather reductive reading of Paul.

But Jas. 2:20-26 does in fact represent one of the few direct appeals to Joshua in the New Testament, appealing to Rahab as a paragon of the need for faith to be accompanied by works, seeking to ‘flesh out’ what it means to respond to God faithfully, the concern that I introduced at the beginning of this section. So Jas. 2:20-26 reflects the development of Joshua as myth through the juxtaposition with other myths in which categories of ‘faith’ and ‘works’ are used to interpret response to God in Joshua, from which principles of Christian response to God are developed. But as well as representing an important use of Joshua ‘as myth’ in the context of the New Testament, this usage, juxtaposed with certain Pauline texts in particular, itself gives rise to a plethora of treatments of faith, virtue and works in the Christian tradition concerning what it means to respond to God faithfully, which can be said to represent a matrix of ‘new myths’ that shape Christian identity,³² seeking to define the boundaries of the Christian community, concerns that reflect what Joshua sought to achieve, albeit in rather different ways. Indeed, Rahab’s story is developed as an example of faith in Heb. 11:31, and of faith and hospitality in 1 Clem. 12, and in similar ways in the tradition, as we saw in chapter 8, that essentially take Jas. 2:20-26 as their point of departure. But several questions emerge. First, are these categories of ‘faith’ and ‘works’ fitting perspectives with which to read Rahab’s story? Secondly, if these are fitting perspectives, then to what extent more generally might Rahab’s story shape the construction of Christian identity in juxtaposition with other treatments of faith in the tradition, in which faith is related to virtue or salvation for example, but developed without reference to Joshua per se? Thirdly, given that Rahab is part of a matrix of stories that reflect differing responses to God in Joshua, then might some of the other stories in Joshua similarly give content (perhaps negatively) to what faith looks like? Finally, can these treatments be drawn together so as to develop the significance of Joshua as discourse in the Christian context, i.e., seeking to integrate what one might glean from the responses to the first three questions here into a coherent attempt to re-present what Joshua represented as discourse?³³

³² Here I am suggesting that much of the theological tradition is ‘mythical’ in the sense that it is existentially engaging, and often reflects highly ‘structured’ material concerned with the construction of identity (cf. chapter 2), although I do not wish to claim that it is ‘myth’ in the same way that Joshua is.

To address these questions it will first be necessary to consider the concepts of faith and virtue in particular in the tradition. Whilst space prevents a comprehensive treatment of the development of these concepts in the Christian tradition, here I would like to sketch out an account by briefly considering some interesting representative figures,³⁴ requiring a slight digression in order to provide a renewed frame of reference for considering how 'faith' might relate to Joshua as something of a 'ground clearing' exercise, given that the concepts of faith, works and virtue have become problematic.

I would like to begin with Gregory of Nyssa, for whom faith and virtue are intimately related. Martin Laird suggests that for Gregory faith serves an epistemological function, and is, moreover, the faculty that mediates union with God after the mind has been cut off in a darkness of unknowing, resulting in divine indwelling,³⁵ being a gift from God.³⁶ Laird suggests that 'Paul's justification by faith has become Gregory of Nyssa's union by faith'.³⁷ Anthony Meredith suggests that for Gregory 'faith is not a preliminary state, but that mental and spiritual condition of being perpetually open to and dependent upon the divine self-disclosure'.³⁸ Moreover, whilst Gregory talks of faith as uniting one with God, he also suggests that 'participation in the Beatitudes means nothing else but to have ³³ I.e., representing the culmination of reading Joshua in terms of myth in a Christian context.

³⁴ The kind of reading of the tradition that I wish to develop here takes the approach of Ellen Charry in her By the Renewing of your Minds as a point of departure.

³⁵ M. Laird, Gregory of Nyssa and the Grasp of Faith: Union, Knowledge and Divine Presence (Oxford Early Christian Studies) (Oxford: OUP, 2004), pp.100-101.

³⁶ Ibid., p.105.

³⁷ Ibid., p.106. Perhaps Gregory taught universal salvation so justification is less of an issue (cf. Life of Moses, p.18, cf. II.82-84). However, Luther also said of faith that it 'unites the soul with Christ as a bride is united with her bridegroom' (The Freedom of a Christian, in Basic Theological Writings (ed. T.F. Lull) (Minneapolis: Fortress Press, 1989), pp.585-629, here p.603).

³⁸ A. Meredith, The Cappadocians (Crestwood: St. Vladimir's Seminary Press, 2000), p.67.

communion with the Godhead',³⁹ and Laird develops this theme through De oratione dominica v, on which he comments,

Gregory says that if a person imitates characteristics associated with God, that person becomes what he imitates. For Gregory forgiveness is a virtue, a characteristic of God. By imitating this virtue we become like what we imitate. Virtue, then is both a manifestation of divine life and a means of divinization, or ... 'progressive deification through virtue'.⁴⁰

But in The Life of Moses Gregory speaks of those 'saved by virtue',⁴¹ and indeed for Gregory Moses' life reflects the journey of the life of virtue,⁴² even though it is impossible to attain perfection in this life.⁴³ However, there are 'two pursuits through which virtue is acquired, namely faith toward the divine and conscience toward life.'⁴⁴ Thus faith and virtue are intimately related in Gregory.

The eastern tradition developed a hierarchy of virtues, and Maximus the Confessor develops the hierarchy of virtues as faith, fear of God, self-mastery, patience, long-suffering, hope in God, detachment and love,⁴⁵ with love being the 'summary and summit' of the virtues.⁴⁶ But Lars Thunberg suggests that a 'striking fact in relation to Maximus' understanding of faith is his high evaluation of this basic theological virtue. Both Evagrius and Maximus see faith as the foundation and starting-point of Christian life as a whole,' and faith 'gives knowledge of God' that 'can be contrasted with sensual knowledge'.⁴⁷ He suggests that the three 'theological virtues' (Thunberg's term) are related in Maximus to the progression of the Christian life in which faith is attached to the beginning – it lays the foundation of Christian life – while hope performs a task of mediation, since it indicates that which is believed and makes real that which is the object of love. And charity is above all related to the end, the consummation of all. ... Maximus presents charity ... as the end of man's motion toward his divine goal, an end which is able to replace both ³⁹ The Beatitudes, Sermon 5, in H.C. Graef, St. Gregory of Nyssa: The Lord's Prayer, The Beatitudes (ACW 18) (New York: Paulist Press, 1954), p.130.

⁴⁰ Laird, Gregory, p.189. Cf. Life of Moses, I.7, p.31: '[w]hoever pursues true virtue participates in nothing other than God, because he himself is absolute virtue'.

⁴¹ Life of Moses, II.9, p.57.

⁴² Ibid, II.42, p.64.

⁴³ Ibid, II.290, pp.128-129.

⁴⁴ Ibid, II.192, p.104.

⁴⁵ L. Thunberg, Microcosm and Mediator: The Theological Anthropology of Maximus the Confessor (Chicago: Open Court, 2nd ed. 1995), p.286.

⁴⁶ Ibid, p.309.

⁴⁷ Ibid, pp.317-318.

faith and hope. ... Thus it is made fully clear that charity alone, in Maximus' opinion, brings man to mystical union with God.⁴⁸

Again, one sees the intimate relationship between faith and virtue developed, and how this relates to the goal of the Christian life understood as union with God.

Turning to the western tradition, Mary Clark notes that for Augustine, faith 'is the response to God's self-revelation and the only access to God as Trinity. By faith persons communicate with God',⁴⁹ whereas John Rist notes that, 'Virtue, says Augustine [De moribus ecclesiae catholicae 1.15.25], is "nothing other" than the supreme love of God'; for Augustine all forms of virtue are 'modes of love'.⁵⁰ Likewise Bonnie Kent suggests that '[v]irtues are unified through charity' for Augustine, but also that '[v]irtue is a threshold, not the end of the road of moral development, so that we are justified in considering people virtuous if they are only moving in the right direction, are steadily trying'.⁵¹ Regarding works, Gregory Lombardo notes that in Augustine's On Faith and Works he seeks to refute both 'the Pelagian heresy, which said that justification depended solely on man's efforts, and the heresy of justification by faith alone.' For Augustine, 'the only faith that justifies is that faith which is enlivened by charity'.⁵² Augustine distinguishes between works before justification from those after, noting that works do not merit faith.⁵³ On Faith and Works is an interesting work for it is thoroughly exegetical throughout, but is a response to a very pastoral concern, tackling the question of who should be admitted to baptism, a concern that introduces the work and remains in view throughout. In it Augustine refuses a simplistic 'proof texting', seeking a 'middle course', noting that people go astray when they do not take a middle course.⁵⁴ He argues that 'morals and faith ... are mutually connected. ... [T]he Scriptures sometimes speak of one and not of the other ... instead of both together, so that we might perceive from this ⁴⁸ Ibid, pp.319-320. Here, and in the remainder of the discussion, charity should be construed more in terms of love than in the contemporary sense of charity, although contemporary understanding of love seems problematic also.

⁴⁹ M. Clark, 'de Trinitate', in E. Stump & N. Kretzmann (eds), The Cambridge Companion to Augustine (Cambridge: CUP, 2001), pp. 91-102, here p.97.

⁵⁰ J. Rist, 'Faith and Reason', in The Cambridge Companion to Augustine, pp.26-39, here p.36.

⁵¹ B. Kent, 'Augustine's Ethics', in The Cambridge Companion to Augustine, pp.205-233, here pp.228-229.

⁵² G.J. Lombardo, 'Introduction', in St. Augustine: On Faith and Works (ACW 48) (New York: The Newman Press, 1988), pp.1-6, here p.3.

⁵³ Ibid, pp.4-5. Cf. On Faith and Works 14.21, pp.28-29; 'the works of the law are meritorious not before but after justification'.

⁵⁴ On Faith and Works 4.5, p.11.

procedure that the one cannot exist apart from the other.’⁵⁵ Throughout the work Augustine repeatedly refers to Gal. 5:6, that ‘faith works by love’, although he has little to say regarding virtue per se in this work, even if Rist’s remarks indicates that the concept is implicitly understood here.

For Thomas Aquinas faith, hope and charity are the three theological virtues, virtues which differ from the ‘natural virtues’ in that they result from a special infusion of grace,⁵⁶ and cannot be acquired by the repetition of suitable actions,⁵⁷ being ‘wholly from outside’.⁵⁸ But these theological virtues are interconnected dispositions. Faith and hope can exist without charity, but do not have ‘the perfect character of virtue’ without it;⁵⁹ but charity cannot exist without faith and hope⁶⁰ since charity is friendship with God.⁶¹ Terence Penelhum suggests that for Aquinas no one of the three theological virtues ‘can embody, within itself, all the salient and distinctive features of the Christian life.’⁶² But he notes that acts of assent and confession that result from faith are signs that the will is disposed by charity in Aquinas; ‘There is nothing odd about suggesting that a man’s faith may reflect his charity, just as his charity may be a consequence of his faith.’⁶³ Indeed, Aquinas suggests that,

As habits they [faith, hope and charity] are all infused together. ... Now it is by faith that the mind apprehends what it hopes for and loves. And so in the sequence of coming to be, faith has to precede hope and charity. ...

In the precedence of value, however, charity comes before faith and hope, because both faith and hope come alive through charity, and receive from charity their full stature of virtues. For thus charity is the mother of all the virtues, inasmuch as it is the form of all of them.⁶⁴

⁵⁵ Ibid 13.20, pp.27-28.

⁵⁶ Cf. ST 1a2ae.63,1 & 51,4.

⁵⁷ ST 1a2ae.63,2. Cf. T. Penelhum, ‘The Analysis of Faith in St. Thomas Aquinas’, in Religious Studies 13/2 (1977), pp.133-154, here pp.134-135.

⁵⁸ ST 1a2ae.63,2.

⁵⁹ ST 1a2ae.65,4.

⁶⁰ ST 1a2ae.65,5.

⁶¹ ST 2a2ae.23,1; Penelhum, ‘Faith’, pp.136-137.

⁶² Penelhum, ‘Faith’, p.137.

⁶³ Ibid, p.142.

⁶⁴ ST 1a2ae.62, 4, vol. 23, p.147. He notes elsewhere that since ‘the ultimate end is present to the will through hope and charity, to the mind through faith, it necessarily follows that faith is absolutely the first of the virtues; no natural knowledge can reach God as he is the object of beatitude, i.e. as hope and charity are fixed upon God.’ (ST 2a2ae.4,7, vol. 31, p.139. Cf. 2a2ae.2,3; faith is beyond reason for supernatural knowledge is needed (p.75).) However, he also suggests that ‘certain virtues may be said to be prior to faith incidentally, i.e. as removing obstacles for the believer: courage, for example, may take away a fear inhibiting belief; humility, a pride of mind resisting submission to the truth of faith. ... [F]aith without

Elsewhere Aquinas suggests that ‘the good ... the end of faith’s act, is the divine good, the proper object of charity. This is why charity is called the form of faith, namely because the act of faith is completed and shaped by charity.’⁶⁵ T.C. O’Brien adds in a footnote to this text that

There is more in the conclusion than simply an instance of a virtuous act’s being shaped by charity toward the love and service of God. The primacy of end used in the argument here is meant to express the specific scriptural theme that faith is the beginning of salvation and eternal life ... Faith in its proper species and form is determined by its formal objective, God, the first truth; but he addresses the believer not as imparting information to mind alone, but as inviting to salvation ... Thus faith calls for love, self-commitment, and it is in this distinctive sense that it has its completion from charity; only in one who loves God does faith reach its fully intended meaning as the beginning of eternal life⁶⁶ and also in a note to another text that ‘Form’ and the adjectival correlates ... were readily adopted in the medieval discussions of virtue because forma has the common meaning, ‘perfection’ or ‘completion’ ... Specifically with regard to faith, it is described as unformed where charity is lacking in that it empowers a person for an act of believing God without error, but not for an act that is meritorious. ... [T]he act of faith, like that of other virtues, has a further dimension, moral kind or form, by ‘the diffusion, as it were, of the reign of charity over it.’⁶⁷

Indeed, Aquinas develops a distinction between ‘formed’ and ‘unformed’ faith, suggesting that the distinction ‘is grounded in something connected with the will, namely charity, and not on something connected with the intellect.’⁶⁸ He argues that formed faith is a virtue whereas formless faith is not (‘Charity gives form to the act of faith’).⁶⁹ But as well as distinguishing between formed and unformed faith, Aquinas also differentiates ‘implicit’ from ‘explicit’ faith, in which an ‘implicit faith’ is a faith that ‘simple people’ have in ‘what their teachers believe’.⁷⁰ He considers whether an ‘explicit faith’ is necessary for all for salvation, and after noting that ‘matters of faith surpass reason’, and citing Dionysius concerning hierarchies and their theological significance (Celestial Hierarchy 12), he concludes that it is not.⁷¹ But what is interesting is that he continues in the next article:

should any have been saved who had received no revelation, they were not saved without faith in the mediator. The reason: even if they did not have an explicit belief in Christ, they did have an implicit charity is not the foundation; but this still does not require that charity exist before faith.’ (ST 2a2ae.4,7, vol. 31, p.141).

⁶⁵ ST 2a2ae.4,3 vol. 31, p.125.

⁶⁶ O’Brien, in ST, vol. 31, p.125.

⁶⁷ Ibid, pp.123-124.

⁶⁸ ST 2a2ae.4,4, vol. 31, p.129.

⁶⁹ ST 2a2ae.4,5, vol. 31, p.133.

⁷⁰ ST 2a2ae.2,5-8, vol. 31, pp.79-97.

⁷¹ ST 2a2ae.2,6, vol. 31, p.85.

faith in God's providence, believing that God is man's deliverer in ways of his own choosing, as the Spirit would reveal this to those who know the truth.⁷²

This raises the interesting possibility that 'saving faith' may be construed in, and expressed in ways other than explicit verbal confession of Christ. So in Aquinas we discover a development of some of the themes of the earlier material, with the importance of virtue rising to the fore. He seeks to clarify and develop the relationship between faith and virtue, particularly in the way that faith relates to love, and how this relates to God and the beatific vision. In Aquinas we find careful, sensitive pastoral theology, seeking not to over-burden all (such as young children or those with learning difficulties perhaps) with an 'explicitness' of faith (however desirable this might be), but seeking to encourage one's faith to be formed in love as one is 'in relationship' with God.

Thus far, it is notable that this development of faith and virtue together has been conducted without it becoming 'salvation by works' (with works being a category that has been avoided), but rather the discussion has been conducted with reference to union by faith, as a response to a gracious gift, to God in love, resulting in a life of virtue which is participation in God.

However, this begins to change with Calvin, even though in fact the differences that develop seem to relate to emphasis, with the practical outworking of faith looking fairly similar, although over time the difference in emphasis becomes something of a 'stand-off', with the language of virtue disappearing altogether. For Calvin faith is 'a firm and certain knowledge of God's benevolence toward us, founded upon the truth of the freely given promise in Christ, both revealed to our minds and sealed upon our hearts through the Holy Spirit.'⁷³ However, 'faith rests upon the knowledge of Christ. And Christ cannot be known apart from the sanctification of his Spirit. It follows that faith can in no wise be separated from a devout disposition.'⁷⁴ Thus although Calvin sets things up rather differently, he is, in fact, fairly close to Aquinas and Augustine. Indeed, later on Calvin asks, ⁷² ST 2a2ae.2,7, vol. 31, p.93.

⁷³ Inst III.ii.7, p.551.

⁷⁴ Inst III.ii.8, pp.552-553.

[H]ow can the mind be aroused to taste the divine goodness without at the same time being wholly kindled to love God in return? ... [T]he teaching of the Schoolmen, that love is prior to faith and hope, is mere madness; for it is faith alone that first engenders love in us. ... [W]herever this faith is alive, it must have along with it the hope of eternal salvation as its inseparable companion.⁷⁵

But despite similarities, Calvin wishes to depart from the Schoolmen, and abolish the distinctions between formed and unformed faith, and explicit and implicit faith. He suggests that 'we must refute that worthless distinction between formed and unformed faith which is tossed about in the schools. For they imagine that people who are touched by no fear of God, no sense of piety, nevertheless believe whatever it is necessary to know for salvation.'⁷⁶ Elsewhere he discusses the problem of 'implicit faith' in the Scholastic literature, which he sees as faith based not on understanding but on ignorant obedience to the church.⁷⁷ However, whilst the language of confession is accentuated in Calvin, the language of virtue drops out. He sees virtues, or 'images of virtues' as he terms them, as simply gifts from God,⁷⁸ wishing here, it seems, to emphasize the praiseworthiness of God and the fallen-ness of humanity. Indeed, he continues,

Yet what Augustine writes is nonetheless true: that all who are estranged from religion of the one God, however admirable they may be regarded on account of their reputation for virtue, not only deserve no reward but rather punishment, because by the pollution of their hearts they defile God's good works. For even though they are God's instruments for the preservation of human society in righteousness, continence, friendship, temperance, fortitude and prudence, yet they carry out these good works of God very badly. ... Therefore, since by the very impurity of men's hearts these good works have been corrupted as from their source, they ought no more to be reckoned among virtues than the vices that commonly deceive on account of their affinity and likeness to virtue.⁷⁹

This kind of account of faith is developed by Barth. For Barth, 'Faith as such cannot contribute anything to our justification ... It is not a habitus. It is not a quality of grace which is infused into man' and it is not a virtue, which he construes as a 'power and an ⁷⁵ Inst III.ii.41-42, pp.589-590. This does not seem to be the view of Aquinas, although here Calvin's dialogue partner is Peter Lombard. Calvin appears to be closer in emphasis to the tradition than Luther, although Luther does suggest, for example, that, 'by faith the soul is cleansed and made to love God' (The Freedom of a Christian, p.611), and 'from faith ... flow forth love and joy in the Lord, and from love a joyful, willing, and free mind that serves one's neighbor willingly' (ibid, p.619), although 'the Christian who is consecrated by faith does good works, but the works do not make him holier or more Christian, for that is the work of faith alone' (ibid, pp.612-613). This, it seems, is a clear departure from the tradition in which participation (and 'ascent') in the virtues was seen as participation in, and ascent into, the life of God. It seems that in the tradition 'salvation' and 'sanctification' were construed in more holistic terms than in the Reformers. Luther is also concerned that works lead to a false confidence (ibid, pp.621-622).

⁷⁶ Inst III.ii.8, p.551.

⁷⁷ Inst III.ii.2, pp.544-545.

⁷⁸ Inst III.xiv.2, p.770.

⁷⁹ Inst III.xiv.3, p.770.

achievement of man' (i.e. a 'work').⁸⁰ Thus Barth develops the pessimistic theological anthropology found in Calvin, and reacts against any tendencies to reify grace and faith, with emphasis being placed on the nature of faith as trusting in the work of another (Christ) on one's behalf. He suggests that faith is just this and nothing but this: the confidence of sinful man in the demonstration of the undeserved faithfulness of God as given in Jesus Christ, a demonstration in which he finds that his sins are forgiven. If there is any corresponding faithfulness of sinful man to the faithful God, it consists only in this confidence. As he gives this confidence, he finds himself justified, but not otherwise. That was what the reformers maintained. ... When [faith] is a matter of recognising and apprehending of justification, it denies the competence, the relevance, the power and the value of all human action. ... Because faith is obedient humility, abnegation, it will and must exclude any co-operation of human action in the matter of man's justification.⁸¹

So whilst for Barth faith has 'other dimensions than that of justification',⁸² 'faith of the man justified by God is opposed to all his works', although he notes that 'works' for Paul meant 'the works which the Old Testament demanded of the members of God's chosen people Israel to mark their distinction from other peoples'.⁸³ However, human works as such cannot be regarded with contempt or indifference, and rejected. They are the (in itself) inevitable and good actualisation of the (in itself) good creaturely nature of man. They can and must be done. And faith itself would not be faith if it did not work by love, if it were not as Luther put it, "a living, active, busy thing." ... Where there is faith, there are also love and works.⁸⁴

Again, in some respects in practice Barth is close to Aquinas and Augustine here; for Barth faith reflects an openness to its object, that is to Jesus Christ, and 'does represent an imitation of God, an analogy to His attitude and action.'⁸⁵ But he is concerned with the problem of absorbing the doctrine of justification into that of sanctification 'understood as the pious work of self-sanctification which man can undertake and accomplish in his own strength.'⁸⁶ He goes on to analyze the 'act of faith' using the categories of Anerkennen, Erkennen and Bekennen (which may be translated as acknowledgement, recognition and confession).⁸⁷ So in Barth one discovers an emphasis on the object of faith – Jesus Christ, and of the acknowledgment, recognition and confession of him. But whilst, as in Calvin, we see a recognition of the importance of love in relation to faith, the ⁸⁰ CD IV.1, p.617.

⁸¹ CD IV.1, pp.626-627. The idea of faith as 'the humility of obedience' is something that is important for Barth in this section (cf. e.g. p.620, and p.628 where he describes 'faith as the humility which involves necessarily the exclusion of works').

⁸² CD IV.1, p.618.

⁸³ CD IV.1, p.621. Barth seems to anticipate the 'New Perspective' on Paul here.

⁸⁴ CD IV.1, p.627.

⁸⁵ CD IV.1, pp.633-634.

⁸⁶ CD IV.1, p.768.

⁸⁷ CD IV.1, pp.758ff.

intimate association of faith with virtue has been eclipsed, owing it seems to a theology of despair – of human depravity and the desire to avoid any hint of an idea of salvation by works; a fear of Pelagianism. Perhaps then, and rather ironically, Calvin and Barth depart from the tradition that we have considered because their theology is in fact somewhat infatuated with the human subject together with a distrust of the ability of God to manifest himself in humanity. We also see a wedge driven between justification and sanctification, something that is alien to the theologians we have considered prior to Calvin.

More generally, in the intellectual climate of modernity, there is a rise in the concern with the cognitive dimensions of faith as belief and as a mental act, and how this is to be understood, having been divorced from an epistemology based upon participation in the Godhead.⁸⁸ However, within this context, interesting accounts of faith (or belief) were developed by Rudolf Bultmann⁸⁹ and Ludwig Wittgenstein, who, in rather different ways drew attention to the existential dimensions of faith. In Bultmann's treatment, one that I do not wish to explore here, the 'object' of faith is eclipsed, but in Wittgenstein's account of religious belief he suggests,

Suppose someone were a believer and said: "I believe in a Last Judgement," and I said: "Well, I'm not so sure. Possibly." You would say that there is an enormous gulf between us. If he said "There is a German aeroplane overhead," and I said "Possibly. I'm not so sure," you'd say we were fairly near.

It isn't a question of my being anywhere near him, but on an entirely different plane, which you could express by saying: "You mean something altogether different, Wittgenstein."

The difference might not show up at all in any explanation of the meaning.

Why is it that in this case I seem to be missing the entire point?

Suppose somebody made this guidance for this life: believing in the Last Judgment. Whenever he does anything, this is before his mind. In a way, how are we to know whether to say he believes this will happen or not?

Asking him is not enough. He will probably say he has proof.

But he has what you might call an unshakeable belief. It will show, not by reasoning or by appeal to ordinary grounds for belief, but rather by regulating for all in his life.

This is a very much stronger fact—foregoing pleasures, always appealing to this picture. This in one sense must be called the firmest of all beliefs, because the man risks things on account of it which he would not do on things which are by far better established for him.⁹⁰

In a sense then, in Wittgenstein we see the possibility, from within the context of a modernist frame of reference, for a renewal of a more 'holistic' conception of faith than ⁸⁸ Cf. Charry, Renewing, pp.229-236.

⁸⁹ See e.g. R. Bultmann, Theology of the New Testament I (London: SCM, ET:1952), pp.300-302.

⁹⁰ First lecture on religious belief in Ludwig Wittgenstein: Lectures and Conversations on Aesthetics, Psychology and Religious Belief (Oxford: Blackwell, 1966), pp.53-59, here pp.53-54.

that which took hold in the Reformation, and that has subsequently affected much biblical scholarship.

So, returning to Joshua, how might this study of faith in the Christian tradition relate to Joshua's Christian appropriation with reference to its use in Jas. 2:20-26 as a point of departure in which faith and works are categories introduced to interpret Joshua as the basis of a 'new myth'? Working backwards from our contemporary context, starting with Wittgenstein, Wittgenstein helpfully draws attention to the way in which one uses religious language. The 'Last Judgement', and the nature of beliefs related to it, has certain similarities with Rahab and the Gibeonites facing חור. Rahab and the Gibeonites make this prospect of חור the guidance for their life – they take risks and act in the light of it. Thus Joshua might be said to have certain affinities with Wittgenstein's account of belief, which draws attention to the active and existential nature of the claim to believe, or to have faith perhaps. However, perhaps Wittgenstein's account does not really differentiate Rahab's response from that of the Gibeonites.

Turning to Barth, his analysis of the 'act of faith' in terms of Anerkennen, Erkennen and Bekennen (to recognize, to acknowledge and to confess), can certainly be applied to Rahab, but perhaps, to a lesser extent, to Achan (7:19-20), although his confession appears to be confession in a rather 'thin' sense, essentially being confession of sin rather than of the glory of YHWH, although his response does seem to reflect a recognition and acknowledgement of the true state of affairs with respect to YHWH. Furthermore, perhaps Barth's description of the act of faith may describe the Gibeonite response to some degree, but in a sense their 'confession' is more comparable to Achan's than to Rahab's, being a rather 'thin' response that does not glorify YHWH, yet they are 'saved' whereas Achan is stoned to death. So in one sense Barth's account of the 'act of faith' helpfully accentuates Rahab's response, but is a little problematic with regard to Achan and the Gibeonites. Moreover, Achan and Rahab's stories are somewhat disorientating for those accounts of Christian response to God that stress the confession and forgiveness of sin as being 'the bottom line' of the Christian life. Indeed, unlike Achan, Rahab does not confess any sin, despite her characterization as a prostitute, and Achan is executed despite his confession of sin, a form of confession that is found everywhere in the tradition from at least 1 John 1:9-10 onwards (e.g. ST 2a2ae.3,2). So it is interesting that Rahab is sometimes viewed as something like a ‘model convert’ even though she fails to confess sin,⁹¹ whilst Achan, whilst confessing his sin, is nowhere, as far as I am aware in the Christian tradition, a model penitent.⁹² Moreover Barth’s account of faith as the act of the Christian life as ‘obedient humility’ perhaps runs into difficulty here too, for arguably it is Achan who demonstrates the most ‘obedient humility’ of all (7:19-20), since for Rahab and the Gibeonites, their ‘faith’ is expressed in bold and perhaps crafty initiative taking. Moreover, whilst ‘obedient humility’ does, in many senses reflect Joshua and the Israelite response to God in the book as we saw earlier, there is also a sense in which the Israelites are characterized by a greater boldness, or even assertiveness, than Barth’s description might suggest.

With regard to Calvin, I would question his rejection of the various scholastic notions of faith, especially as found in Aquinas. Whilst the distinction between implicit and explicit faith does not find expression in Joshua, it seems that in addition to Rahab’s confession being ‘fuller’ than Achan’s or the Gibeonites’ (cf. ST 2a2ae.3,2), her ‘faith’ might be distinguished from the Gibeonite ‘faith’ in that it is ‘formed’ rather than ‘unformed’, being reflected in her virtue,⁹³ taking this to be a redescription of what the narrative interprets as נִסָּה, being that which I have argued demonstrates her Israelite quality. This, coupled with her courage, leads to her ‘salvation’. But we do not find this virtue, or ‘formed-ness’ of faith in the Gibeonites, although the narrative implies their ‘salvation’, even if, as we saw in Origen’s reading of their story,⁹⁴ it is a somewhat ‘thinner’ salvation than Rahab’s. So it seems then Joshua might support the scholastic distinction between formed and unformed faith, even if it is, perhaps, to be applied in a slightly different way; the Gibeonites obtained salvation through their unformed faith, whilst Rahab obtained a ⁹¹ E.g., Cyril of Jerusalem suggests that she is ‘saved through repentance’ (Catechetical Lectures 2.9, in ACCS, p.12). If this is not to do violence to the text such repentance must be construed in terms of her actions rather than a confession of sin. (Cf. chapter 8, and, e.g. Hess, Joshua, pp.96-97, 134-135).

⁹² However, we saw in chapter 8 that in the Jewish tradition he was a model penitent for one finding life in the world to come, but this move does not appear to have been made in the Christian tradition.

⁹³ I deliberately use ‘virtue’ in favour of ‘works’ here, as this is the grammar of the tradition.

⁹⁴ Hom Josh. 10.1-2 (cf. chapter 8).

‘better’ or ‘fuller’ ‘salvation’ through her formed faith reflected in her virtue that constituted her response to God.

But does it make sense to speak of ‘salvation’ in this way – is it not part of a binary system in which one is either ‘saved’ or ‘not saved’? It is worth developing this concept of ‘salvation’ here, for as Charry noted, it has become an increasingly ‘thin’ concept in much of the Christian tradition, with the focus of salvation being on the forgiveness of sins, rather than as participation, in some sense, in the divine life.⁹⁵ However, if salvation is construed rather more broadly and ‘holistically’ as conquering death and entering into life in its fullness, then Rahab’s and the Gibeonite ‘salvation’ is intelligible in these terms – Rahab ‘conquers’ the death that awaits the other inhabitants of Jericho, and enters into the fullness of life with Israel, and hence YHWH, whereas the Gibeonites, whilst ‘conquering death’ enter into a life of servitude. The difficulties that might be raised regarding the forgiveness of the sins of Rahab’s former way of life, something that the narrative does not dwell on, are then relativized because forgiveness is not the focus of salvation; rather life with God is the focus. Indeed, Charry notes that for Augustine ‘salvation is dwelling in the fullness of God’,⁹⁶ and that one enjoys God by participating in the good - ‘Augustine pressed Christians ... to taste and enjoy God. And since the “essence” of God is justice, wisdom, love and goodness, participation in these qualities is eternal life with God.’⁹⁷ In other words, one can construe salvation in terms of participation in these qualities, qualities that are, in some sense, demonstrated in Rahab.

But such a construal of salvation as participation in the divine qualities (or virtues perhaps) is, it seems, suggestive of the concept of ‘implicit faith’ as developed in Aquinas, which, in Christian terms, raises the possibility of salvation outside the visible church, i.e., of those who do not explicitly confess Christ in word, even though this is somewhere that Augustine, for example, does not go.⁹⁸ But if what Joshua sought to

⁹⁵ Charry, Renewing, p.121.

⁹⁶ Ibid, p.121.

⁹⁷ Ibid, p.133, cf. p.137 & de Trinitate VIII:2.5.

⁹⁸ In On Faith and Works Augustine suggests that an act is ‘not a morally good act unless it is done out of devotion to God’ (7.11, p.17). Lombardo comments in a note that Augustine never condemns as bad virtuous acts of pagans, but suggests that for Augustine the ‘defect of the virtues of the pagans ... is that ...

achieve as an act of discourse was to make the construction of Israelite identity a rather more problematic affair than it was traditionally perceived to be, ‘blurring the boundaries’ of the community, then a ‘blurring of the boundaries’ of those who are reckoned as ‘God’s people’ today by making problematic the traditional criterion of explicit verbal confession of Christ (and of sin) by using the category of implicit faith seems to reflect precisely what Joshua sought to achieve, the only question being whether the category of ‘implicit faith’ is a theologically good one to use. But, in light of the patristic voices relating to the cultivation and exercise of virtue as being salvation and dwelling in the fullness of God, then this observation coupled with the rather disturbing story of Matt. 25:31-46 indicates that an implicit faith that reflects Christian virtue, even if it is not named as such, reflects that which is to characterize faithful response to God and the manifestation of the image of God in humanity. Of course, this does not imply that an explicit faith should not be encouraged and sought, for in any case an explicit faith does, it seem, offer a greater ‘chance of success’ in cultivating Christian virtue, but it recognizes that there are those who for various reasons are unable to develop such an explicit faith. Conversely, it would be precisely the confidence of an explicit confession of faith that is not ‘worked out’ in virtue that a re-appropriation of Joshua in terms of Achan’s story (and Matt. 25:31-46) would seek to undermine.

However, this participation in the life of God may also be viewed, according to Gregory of Nyssa, in terms of union with God through faith. Indeed, it is interesting that Ecclesiastes Rabbah points in a vaguely similar direction, in which it is said that Rahab is brought into ‘union’ with Israel.⁹⁹ Both Gregory and the midrash may reflect the influence of Hellenistic categories, but it is interesting that similar language may be employed in these different traditions to discuss the effects of Rahab’s response. Thus one might well speak of faith as in some sense ‘attaching’ oneself to God, perhaps in Rahab’s case demonstrating also a detachment from ‘the world’, to use a category of they are not directed to God, to their supernatural end’ (p.81). Since this work and de Trinitate were written in a similar era in Augustine’s life, it may suggest that Charry’s reading needs to be carefully nuanced, even if her reading opens interesting theological possibilities. The question, it seems, is one of whether a virtue needs to have an explicitly directed end that is recognized or not for it to reflect genuine participation in the Godhead. For Aquinas, it seems that it does not to the same extent that it does in Augustine.

⁹⁹ Eccl. Rab. 5.13, ‘Rahab ... whom [God] brings and attaches to Israel’ (מביאו ומדבקו בישראל).

traditional Christian spirituality.¹⁰⁰ But for Gregory of Nyssa virtue seems to be a manifestation of the divine union too, rather than its source, although he does speak of ‘salvation through virtue’, which has the effect of drawing faith and virtue together. But given that in Joshua the narrative stresses Rahab’s רַחֲבָה as being that which leads to her ‘salvation’, this perspective of ‘salvation through virtue’ does reflect Rahab’s story well. The difficulty that one encounters is, perhaps, one of causality. So, for example, in Maximus faith appears to be a virtue that is always necessary, but in some sense leads to the development of other virtues, whereas in Aquinas the situation appears more complex, with faith being a virtue, but one of three ‘theological virtues’ (faith, hope and love) that are received ‘from outside’ by grace, that ‘raises one’ above one’s own nature (cf. ST 2a2ae.6,1). But in a sense, in Rahab’s story her faith and virtue coexist, with there being no particular sense that her faith preceded her virtue or that it was graciously infused.

However, Joshua is simply uninterested in these later Christian questions of causality and infusion, and the issue is one of how Joshua is appropriated well in the Christian context in which these interpretative categories arise.¹⁰¹ Whilst in Rahab faith and other virtues may coexist, suggesting that James offers a good reading of her story, being that which results in her ‘salvation’ when read in Christian terms, generally speaking, the New Testament seems to suggest that virtue or goodness (cf. 2 Pet. 1:3-5) results from transformative encounter with God, which is manifested in faith as appropriate human response.¹⁰² Indeed, Joshua is not concerned with the process or causes of ‘salvation’; rather, Joshua is concerned with challenging established notions of who may ‘mingle’ with Israel in the practical situations in which Israelites encounter those who are not ethnically Israel but behave like Israelites nonetheless, however their character and responsiveness to YHWH actually came about. Moreover, part of the difference between ¹⁰⁰ Here, particularly as I am developing the ‘mythical’ nature of this material, being that which is concerned largely with existential response, I do not wish to make metaphysical claims regarding the use of such language and of what might be described as a ‘Christian Neoplatonism’. Rather, I wish to suggest that such language – of union with and participation in the Godhead offers an imaginative and existentially engaging account of the nature of the Christian life, that as a symbol, points toward the metaphysical nature of the Christian life even though it may fall short of an adequate metaphysical description per se.

¹⁰¹ Cf. Clément, Roots, in which he notes that questions of causality become much more of a focus in the West. (p.81).

¹⁰² There are, I think, exceptions to this, e.g. John 3:19-21.

Joshua and the New Testament may be described in neo-structuralist categories; the New Testament is concerned with conversion from ‘outsider to insider’ in a sense that the Old Testament is not. The category of ‘faith’ describes at the ‘narrative level’ the possibility of transformation at the structural level in the New Testament, whilst perhaps the idea of the cultivation of virtue expresses mediation, that one is simultaneously a ‘sinner and a saint’,¹⁰³ a mediation that is expressed in theological language as the indwelling and transforming activity of the Holy Spirit. In the Old Testament, it was אָרַם that denied the possibility of transformation or mediation, although as we have seen, Joshua used this very category to undermine the distinction between Israel and non-Israel on ethnic grounds; in other words, Joshua marks a very significant shift towards the transformation and mediation implied by the gospel that is expressed in faith and virtue.

In summary then, considering the development of faith and virtue in the tradition in juxtaposition with Joshua, we see how Joshua illuminates some of the ways in which these ideas have been developed, and conversely how these categories can illuminate what is going on in Joshua. However, what also emerges is a sense of the difference between Joshua and the Christian context, which urges caution in using the material in Joshua at the narrative level to provide paradigms for faith or the Christian life even as they may challenge certain contemporary Christian assumptions. The stories of Rahab, Achan and the Gibeonites can, as we have just seen, help sketch the contours of what it means to respond to God faithfully in faith. Yet it is important also to recognize the theological shift between the contexts of the Old and New Testaments, and to respect the mythical nature of the material in Joshua, which is constructed at the narrative level using ‘limit-situations’ which do not necessarily offer a model for behaviour. In the Christian context, Barth and Calvin's positions, despite their difficulties, emphasize that it is Jesus who brings salvation via response to his gracious offer of life,¹⁰⁴ and that the Christian life is not finally dependent upon a way of moral living that relies upon one's own moral achievement, as is indicated in the parable of the Pharisee and the tax collector (Luke 18:9-14). But what Calvin and Barth tended to lose, something lost more significantly in modernity more generally, is the emphasis in the tradition on the participatory rather than cognitive dimensions to faith,¹⁰⁵ and the possibility of a more 'holistic' understanding of salvation as participating in the life of God.

¹⁰³ Furthermore, in Paul’s language of salvation, the event of ‘salvation’ is something generally described in the future – in the Pauline and Deutero-Pauline literature σῶζω is used 29x. It is used 11x in a future sense, 3x in a present sense, and only 3x in a past sense, which, it is interesting to note, all occur in the Deutero-Pauline texts (Eph. 2:5, 8; 2 Tim. 1:9, Tit. 3:5). There are 11 occurrences that are ambiguous, with it being possible to take the sense in any of these three ways. But it seems that for Paul salvation is something that has a future rather than past dimension. In this case, if as we saw in Gregory and Maximus for example, true faith results in and is manifested in virtue, then it seems quite possible to say that one is saved through virtue. In the sense that virtue is identified as something that one moves towards, rather than achieving in completion, then this account does still work for what has become a paradigmatic case of salvation, the thief on the cross. However, it seems that pastoral context will indeed determine whether it is the exercise of faith or of virtue that is to be emphasized.

However, perhaps most significantly, if one is to seek to re-appropriate what Joshua sought to achieve as discourse, then perhaps one might suggest that salvation, whilst still construed as response to Christ, perhaps need not be taken as a response that necessitates verbal confession, but of a way of life of virtue whose end is not explicitly identified, and conversely that a verbal confession that does not develop into a life of virtue results in a rather 'thin' salvation that risks being no salvation at all (cf. Matt. 25:31-46). Such salvation can be pictured by evoking the imagery of miraculously crossing the Jordan, the interior warfare in which 'the flesh' is crucified as one is 'weaned off' idolatry in obedience to God as one moves toward the goal of resting in God.

9.4 The context and use of Joshua

Thus far I have said rather little about Joshua's original context and form of use, for it seems to make rather little difference to Joshua's theological interpretation when read as myth, since I have argued that it finds its significance largely in terms of its use rather than its origin. Whilst I argued, using the hermeneutics of Paul Ricoeur, that its good use is concerned with an exploration of its plenitude and fittingness, with the interpreter being guided by a 'fusing of horizons' of the world of the text and the world of the reader in which the fittingness of any interpretation is guided by the public 'codes of production' with respect to which the text was created, this does not mean that the original intention, or perhaps ‘originally intended perlocutionary response’ is necessarily normative, given the ‘iconic’ nature of the text, as argued by Paul Ricoeur.¹⁰⁶ Indeed, I have argued that such intentions undergo transformation by the placement of texts such as Joshua in the canon as a new act of discourse, and its later juxtaposition with other ‘myths’.

¹⁰⁴ I.e., there is a danger that faith and grace can become reified to the extent that God's action in Christ becomes obscured.

¹⁰⁵ Similarly Charrý tracks the divorce of goodness and happiness from truth during the history of the church, with truth and knowledge reduced to their purely cognitive dimensions. (Renewal, p.229). But within the Platonic notion of truth that prevailed in the Christian tradition 'to know the truth was to be in the truth. To know the good, in Christian understanding, was to participate in it with God's help.' (p.235) Alas this notion became associated with Pelagianism (p.236).

However, the reading that I have been developing is one that seeks to be sympathetic to the text and one that seeks to encourage its ongoing use. This is in contrast to Robert Coote, whose reading is, however, at one level similar to the one developed here. Coote suggests that

As an expression of Josiah’s reform, the story of Joshua’s conquest, patterned on Josiah’s reconquest, “functions as an instrument of coercion” and intimidation, encouraging the submission of all subjects. The historian wants to terrorize the populace, particularly its recalcitrant political leaders, into submission to Josiah by showing what happens to a class of people (“Canaanites”) whose interests are opposed to the interests of Josiah’s monarchy and of the peasantry under him. The writer also shows that obedience to Josiah can take precedence over supposed ethnic affiliation: Canaanites can submit and be saved (Rahab, the Gibeonites), and if a Judahite belonging to the Israelite in group disobeys the Commander-in-chief, he can be repudiated and killed (Achan) “The primary purpose of the conquest narrative is to send a message to internal rivals, potential Achans, that they can make themselves into outsiders very easily.” Josiah’s historian “uses the rhetoric of warfare and nationalism as an encouragement and a threat to its own population to submit voluntarily to the central authority of a government struggling to organize itself and to [re]create its own ideological framework of inclusion. In order to justify violent action [to that end], the dynamics of the literature of warfare usually consist of a division [often outrageously overstated] between self and other,” us and them.¹⁰⁷

What then distinguishes Coote’s reading from mine? There are two issues, that of origin, and that of use. First, I think that Coote and others, who follow Lori Rowlett for example, are rather hasty in placing Joshua in a Josianic context, and rather too hasty to interpret Josiah’s reign in pejorative terms, a reign that our only witness to is in the books of Kings and Chronicles. But, even if Coote and Rowlett are correct on both points, I have argued that this ‘original intention’ (i.e., as an ‘instrument of coercion’) need not be normative for later usage, usage which undergoes canonical (and indeed liturgical) transformation. ‘Mythically speaking’, there is no reason to privilege this genetic assumption. This brings us to the second issue, that of usage. Whatever the original intention behind Joshua – whether it was an instrument of coercion or not – what matters is how one uses the kind of interpretation that I (and, in some ways Coote) develop. If Joshua does relate to the construction of identity and to the nature of the boundaries of the community in the ways that I have outlined, then is such identity then constructed in a coercive manner or in a manner that allows space for disagreement and freedom in response? Coote seems to assume that Joshua must function as a coercive tool of intimidation. But the reading that I am presenting can be used in the sense of an invitation to allow oneself and the community that values the text to be shaped in particular ways, and called to particular ways of 'being in the world' that might depict the contours a faithful human response to God.¹⁰⁸

¹⁰⁶ See chapters 2-3.

¹⁰⁷ R.B. Coote, ‘The Book of Joshua’, in The New Interpreter’s Bible (Nashville: Abingdon, 1998), vol.2, pp.555-719, here p.577, drawing upon L.L. Rowlett, ‘Inclusion, Exclusion and Marginality in the Book of Joshua’, in JSOT 55 (1992), pp.15-23.

Whilst postcolonial approaches to Joshua have helpfully drawn attention to the terrible misuse of Joshua and other biblical texts, such as by Puritan emigrants to America, postcolonial readings in themselves often fail to be good readings of the text inasmuch as they encourage the adoption of a readerly stance that is not fitting for the text – Joshua exists to shape and challenge identity from the perspective and context of one who is inside the community for whom the text is valued, and not for those outside. In other words, for the perspective of the insider, Joshua provides a searching challenge to attitudes towards outsiders such as Rahab, thus in fact encouraging openness and embrace of 'the other', as well as a searching challenge to the behaviour and attitudes of insiders (Achan). Postcolonial readings in which Joshua is read from a Canaanite perspective only seem to find in the story of Rahab the story of a colluder with imperialism, or a traitor,¹⁰⁹ as Dora Mbuwayesango suggested, which led her to conclude that the book of Joshua can help the people of God to construct its identity in a sound way, namely by acknowledging and making explicit the revulsion we have for its narratives. Precisely because these stories of relentless massacres shock us, they warn us that the construction of identities that are exclusive and religiously sanctioned – however overt or covert this religious exclusivism might be – leads to genocide and extermination of entire ethnic groups.¹¹⁰

¹⁰⁸ Of course difficult issues of claims to speak for God – and the issues of discourse as expressions of power that it raises – lurk beneath the surface here.

¹⁰⁹ See D. Mbuwayesango, 'Joshua' in D. Patte (ed), Global Bible Commentary (Nashville: Abingdon Press, 2004), pp.64-73, here p.66 & M.W. Dube, 'Rahab says Hello to Judith: A Decolonizing Feminist Reading', in R.S. Sugirtharajah (ed.), The Postcolonial Biblical Reader (Oxford: Blackwell, 2006), pp.142-158, here p.156. Cf. discussion in chapter 3.

¹¹⁰ Mbuwayesango, 'Joshua', p.69.

But, as we have seen, this is to misconstrue Joshua.¹¹¹ Mbuwayesango's approach to Joshua is, perhaps, fairly typical of a wave of ideologically critical readings of Joshua that co-opt it into a 'colonial' frame of reference.¹¹² Perhaps Michael Prior's analysis of biblical texts such as Joshua and their use in this regard is one of the most carefully and fully developed analyses in this frame of reference,¹¹³ in which he calls for a 'moral critique' of the Bible and its use.

There are several issues here. First, as I alluded to above, works such as Prior's helpfully provide a theological critique of the use of texts such as Joshua, showing how certain forms of colonial usage are not fitting with respect to the wider Christian tradition, and thus urge critical and careful re-engagement with the text. Secondly, through Victor Turner's approach to myth in particular, we have seen how it is of the nature of material such as Joshua to be amoral in character, and that such materials are not (necessarily) models for behaviour; one cannot simply read principles of Christian ethics off the Old Testament. In this sense, Prior's thesis – of the problematic moral nature of some of the narratives in the Bible – is well taken, but this observation should then lead to a desire to appropriate the text in certain particular ways, rather than its dismissal, reflecting the approach of Origen and Gregory of Nyssa for example. Whilst in this sense I favour continuity with the tradition, perhaps herein lies the biggest 'break' with much traditional Christian reading – that there is not really a 'moral sense' of Scripture to be discerned and applied. But in many ways I do not depart from the way that Joshua's Christian interpretation has in fact been practised, for one finds little in the way of moral exhortation based on Joshua in Origen's homilies for example. But thirdly, there seems to be a danger that certain forms of ideological critical or postcolonial reading might in fact reinforce colonial categories and frames of reference, rather than encouraging them to be transcended, become themselves 'new colonialisms' or hegemonies that obscure beneficent human response to God by doing violence to texts such as Joshua. Writing the text off as a ‘blueprint for colonialism’ mutes the text from speaking in the somewhat challenging way that it does regarding the way in which the community of God’s people is to grow and develop in response to God. Indeed, it seems that just such a ‘transcending’ of colonial / postcolonial categories is precisely what Josh. 5:13-15 might encourage. Moreover, the testimony of the tradition, broadly construed, points away from such ‘colonial’ frames of reference toward using Joshua as a resource with which to develop the spiritual life.

¹¹¹ Mbuwayesango also states that the 'purpose of the book of Joshua ... was to inculcate in the people of Israel an identity that was based on the land' ('Joshua', p.69). But we have seen how Josh. 22 runs in the opposite direction to this.

¹¹² Indeed, Mbuwayesango begins her commentary on Joshua, 'The book of Joshua appears to be a blueprint for the colonization of southern Africa.' ('Joshua', p.64).

¹¹³ M. Prior, The Bible and Colonialism: A Moral Critique (The Biblical Seminar 48) (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1997).

In summary then, Joshua may be read and used appropriately from within the community that values it, for this is the context to which it speaks, and used within this community in a non-coercive manner to urge more faithful response to God.

9.5 Conclusion

We have considered a variety of ways in which Joshua may be appropriated existentially to become part of my/our story, and my/our community’s story – it is a narrative that can be used to imaginatively interpret and develop the Christian’s own, and the church’s own narrative. This is, perhaps, at the heart of what it means to call Joshua myth, and is something like the perspective that Neil Soggie develops:

Whether we like it or not, the reality is that all knowledge (especially knowledge of a sacred or religious flavoring) leads back to the mythic level of knowledge. That is, all knowledge is only meaningful when an individual incorporates it into his or her own personal narrative and worldview to give it meaning about how it relates to me. Hence, we can choose to analyze the ancient texts and great stories of our past objectively, but in the end their intent and power is in how they influence us and impact our lives. Ultimately all literature and knowledge is meaningful only when it comes back to faith, for to be human is to live, to live is to move, to move is to assume and to assume is to have faith. Therefore everyone who is human will live by faith; the question is how do the stories of the past fill out that faith? Is it fragmentary in its mythic understanding of how the ancient source stones relate to us or does it embrace, at least on some relational level, the sacred texts?¹¹⁴

I have sought to develop a reading of Joshua that is fitting with respect to Joshua as an act of discourse, and to the tradition of the community that uses and develops it in juxtaposition with other ‘myths’, in particular as Joshua is part of the canon of Scripture, as being the most significant ‘moment’ of the tradition to which Joshua’s interpretation should be fitting. But the reading developed is also an attempt to explore the plenitude of the text in dialogue with the tradition and the context of the interpreter, and in this process some aspects of Joshua as an act of discourse are accentuated and developed, whilst others recede into the background.

¹¹⁴ Soggie, Myth, p.xvi.

Joshua itself is already part of a dialogue with tradition, or indeed traditions (i.e., priestly and deuteronomistic) as we have seen, a kind of dialogue that continues throughout Joshua's interpretation and use.¹¹⁵ But this dialogue provides testimony to the fittingness of interpretation of Joshua, and gestures toward its revelatory character as the community that cherishes it 'tracks the truth' of its generation of new identity in God.

Whilst the kind of reading that I have developed here is in some ways novel, it is, I would claim, fitting with respect to Joshua as an act of discourse, and a development of the kind of literary reading of Joshua offered by Daniel Hawk for example. Moreover, I have shown that it is 'fitting' with respect to the tradition,¹¹⁶ both of the interpretation of Joshua and of the development of other myths, such as at the canonical stage through texts such as Matt. 15 & 25, even if I have sought to expand the traditional reading of Joshua through questions of identity construction, concerns that were eclipsed in its earlier interpretation and use.

¹¹⁵ Indeed, whilst the differences between the priestly and deuteronomistic traditions have often been emphasized, their juxtaposition in Joshua (and not just the canon) indicates an essential compatibility and harmony of these traditions, even though there are of course significant differences, which might suggest that they testify to the same reality.

¹¹⁶ I have said little about Joshua's reception and use in the Middle Ages, partly because this is difficult to determine. The Glossa Ordinaria on Joshua is essentially a summary of earlier interpretation, suggesting that the sort of reading developed by Origen retains a certain normativity, but it is noteworthy how little used Joshua was in sermons in the Middle Ages. In the recent collation of Middle English Sermons, it is striking that there are only eight references to Joshua in the entire sermon collection (five of which concern Achan's crime) in comparison with over a hundred to Genesis, over a hundred to Exodus, over thirty to Leviticus, over thirty to Numbers, over fifty to Deuteronomy, eleven to Judges, over fifty to 1-2 Samuel, over fifty to 1-2 Kings (V. O'Mara & S. Paul (eds), A Repertorium of Middle English Prose Sermons (SERMO: Studies on Patristic, Medieval and Reformation Sermons and Preaching) (Turnhout: Brepols, 2007) (4 vols)). My suspicion is that it dropped out of use as concerns with history grew. An exception to this picture occurs in Desmond Seward's discussion of life amongst certain Cistercians in the twelfth century in which he suggests that, 'Religious services alternated with military exercises. There were two main meals ... with sacred reading from ... the Bible, special emphasis being placed on the Books of Joshua and the Maccabees.' (The Monks of War: The Military Religious Orders (London: Eyre Methuen, 1972), p.24).

This approach to reading Joshua is, I would claim, precisely what it means to respect its 'mythical' nature and its nature as Christian Scripture. We have seen how a neo-structuralist perspective on myth provides a perspective for reading Joshua in which one can understand much of what it is that Joshua reflects – neo-structuralism is a tool well suited to the task as Joshua turns out, in fact, to be so largely concerned with what we might call 'structural relations'. However, it is important to stress the neo-structuralist analysis here that recognizes the importance of content in the structural categories reflected. Joshua reflects the 'pushing' of an underlying structure in ways that are given content through ancient Israelite cultural categories, and developed and transformed in the Christian context through the development of other myths, and in particular in light of the incarnation and the gift of the Holy Spirit. Victor Turner's analysis of myth provided us with ways of considering what it might mean to appropriate and to enact Joshua existentially, with Paul Ricoeur's treatment of narrative and testimony providing further insight into the kind of material that Joshua is, its hermeneutics, and its significance. Finally, certain psychological approaches highlighted the significance of the desire for 'rest' in Joshua, which was suggestive of a latent eschatological impulse in the book which found development and expression in the Christian tradition in a number of ways, such as in Augustine's notion of resting in God.

Whilst I introduced the category of 'cultural memory' in chapter 1 and have said rather little about it since, it is, nonetheless, important. First, it allows the interpreter space so as not to have to find 'contemporary applicability' for every Old Testament text, or parts thereof, whilst nonetheless enabling one to claim that all such texts are important, with the possibility that the contemporary significance of some text (or part of it) might be located in the fact that it simply provides the community with a sense of history and of rootedness as part of 'our story'. So, for example, one need not feel constrained to have to develop quasi-allegorical interpretations of Josh. 10 in order to develop the Christian significance of the text and in some sense 'redeem' it. Moreover, I have said virtually nothing about the allocation of land in Joshua and of cities of refuge. Whilst these were important concerns in the context of ancient Israel, for the Christian interpreter perhaps there is little more to say, other than to explain their significance, as per some Antiochene exegesis of the Old Testament. Cultural memory allows such texts to be valued, whilst not being ‘used’ in the sense of ‘applied’. Secondly, cultural memory indicates the importance of the symbolic resources offered by texts such as Joshua. Texts, and in particular their use, can become problematic for various reasons, but the perspective offered by cultural memory indicates that it is important to retain such texts as part of the tradition as a cultural resource that narrates the development of the identity of the community affected by such texts. Moreover, instead of discarding symbolism that has become problematic, an awareness of the importance of cultural memory indicates that the better long term solution to the difficulties is to find new ways of speaking about and using the symbolism, such as we saw in the Mekhilta Shirata. Thirdly, cultural memory forms a useful ‘umbrella’ for describing the cultural observation that important texts and symbols are collated and juxtaposed to form the identity of a community through time in what has been dubbed ‘myth’. It is a useful anthropological way of describing the theology of the emergence of the Christian community through Scripture and tradition.

Whilst the reading that I have developed might be criticized for being ‘free ranging homily’, I suggest that rather, it is precisely the kind of reading that emerges when Joshua’s mythical nature is respected, and read and used ‘as myth’ in juxtaposition with other myths and the contemporary context in which the rich symbolic resources are used to interpret and shape imaginatively one’s own and the Christian community’s experience and life. Because of the plenitude and richness of the symbolism, and because of the skill of the narrator of Joshua in simultaneously achieving a number of goals in the story, something that develops as Joshua is drawn into a canon, there are many ways in which Joshua can be imaginatively and constructively used as a resource to shape the response of the people of God. The reading that I have proposed represents an attempt to take seriously both the theological and anthropological ways of describing the use of cherished texts by the Christian community in ways that I hope are mutually enriching and enlightening as the community moves towards its telos of life resting in the goodness and love of God.

Bibliography

Abizadeh, A., 'Historical Truth, National Myths and Liberal Democracy: On the Coherence of Liberal Nationalism' in The Journal of Political Philosophy, 12:3 (2004), pp. 291-313.

Assmann, J., Moses the Egyptian: The Memory of Egypt in Western Monotheism (Cambridge MA: Harvard University Press, 1997).

_____, Religion and Cultural Memory (Stanford: Stanford UP, ET:2006).

Ateek, N.S., Justice and only Justice: A Palestinian Theology of Liberation (Maryknoll: Orbis Books, 1989).

Auld, A.G., Joshua Retold: Synoptic Perspectives (Old Testament Studies) (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1998).

Barth, K., Church Dogmatics (London: T&T Clark (15 vols), paperback ed. 2004).

Barton, J., Reading the Old Testament: Method in Biblical Study (Louisville: WJKP, rev. ed. 1996).

Beeman, W., Language, Status, and Power in Iran (Bloomington: Indiana UP, 1986).

Begg, C.T., 'The Function of Josh 7,1-8,29 in the Deuteronomistic History', in Biblica 67 (1986), pp.320-333.

Ben-Barak, Z., 'Inheritance by Daughters in the Ancient Near East', in JSS 25 (1980), pp.22-33.

Bimson, J.J., Redating the Exodus and Conquest (Sheffield: The Almond Press, rev. ed. 1981).

Blenkinsopp, J., 'The Structure of P', in CBQ 38 (1976), pp.275-292.

Boer, R., 'Green Ants and Gibeonites: B. Wongar, Joshua 9 and some Problems of Postcolonialism', in Semeia 75 (1996), pp.129-152.

Boling, R.G. & Wright, G.E., Joshua: A New Translation with Notes and Commentary (The Anchor Bible 6) (New York: Doubleday, 1982).

Briend, J., 'The Sources of the Deuteronomistic History: Research on Joshua 1-12', in A. de Pury et al (eds.), Israel constructs its History: Deuteronomistic Historiography in recent Research (JSOTSup 306) (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2000), pp.360-386.

Brownlee, W.H., 'The Ceremony of Crossing the Jordan in the Annual Covenanting at Qumran', in W.C. Delsman, et al, eds, Von Kanaan bis Kerala: Festschrift für Prof. Mag. Dr. Dr. J.P.M. van der Ploeg O.P. zur Vollendung des siebzigsten Lebensjahres am 4. Juli 1979 (Verlag Butzon & Bercker, 1982), pp.295-302.

Brueggemann, W.A., Theology of The Old Testament: Testimony, Dispute, Advocacy (Minneapolis: Fortress Press, 1997).

_____, The Land: Place as Gift, Promise and Challenge in Biblical Faith (Overtures to Biblical Theology) (Minneapolis: Fortress Press, 2nd ed. 2002).

Budd, P.J., Numbers (Word Biblical Commentary 5) (Dallas: Word, 1984).

Bultmann, R., Theology of the New Testament I (London: SCM, ET:1952).

_____, 'New Testament and Mythology', in H-W. Bartsch (ed.), Kerygma and Myth (London: SPCK, ET 1953), vol. 1.

Butler, T.C., Joshua (Word Biblical Commentary vol. 7) (Waco: Word Books, 1983).

Campbell, K.M., 'Rahab's Covenant: A Short Note on Joshua ii 9-21', in VT 22/2 (1972), pp.243-244.

Cassirer, E., The Myth of the State (New Haven: Yale UP, 1946).

Carter, J., 'René Girard' in Understanding Religious Sacrifice: A Reader (London: Continuum, 2003), pp.239-275.

Charry, E., By the Renewing of your Minds: The Pastoral Function of Christian Doctrine (Oxford: OUP, 1997).

Childs, B.S., Exodus (The Old Testament Library) (London: SCM, 1974).

_____, Introduction to the Old Testament as Scripture (Philadelphia: Fortress Press, 1979).

Clark, M., 'de Trinitate', in E. Stump & N. Kretzmann (eds), The Cambridge Companion to Augustine (Cambridge: CUP, 2001), pp. 91-102.

Clément, O., The Roots of Christian Mysticism: Text and Commentary (London: New City, ET 2nd ed.: 1994).

Coats, G.W., 'An Exposition of the Conquest Theme', in CBQ 47 (1985), pp.47-54.

_____, 'The Ark of the Covenant in Joshua: A probe into the history of a tradition', in Hebrew Annual Review 9 (1985), pp.137-157.

_____, 'The Book of Joshua: Heroic Saga or Conquest Theme?', in JSOT 38 (1987), pp.15-32.

Collins, J.J., Does the Bible Justify Violence? (Minneapolis: Fortress Press, 2004).

_____, The Bible after Babel: Historical Criticism in a Postmodern Age (Grand Rapids: W.B. Eerdmans, 2005).

Coogan, M.D., 'Archaeology and Biblical Studies: The Book of Joshua', in W.H. Propp et al (eds), The Hebrew Bible and its Interpreters (Winona Lake: Eisenbrauns, 1990), pp.19-32.

Coote, R.B., 'The Book of Joshua', in The New Interpreter's Bible (Nashville: Abingdon, 1998), vol. 2, pp.555-719.

Coupe, L., review of Mythography: The Study of Myths and Rituals (Tuscaloosa: University of Alabama Press, 2nd ed. 2000), by W.G. Doty, in Religion 32.2 (2002), pp.166-168.

Cornelius, I., 'פְּנִיָּה', in NIDOTTE, vol.2, p.669.

Cox, D.G.C., 'The Hardening of Pharaoh's Heart in its Literary and Cultural Contexts' in Bibliotheca Sacra 163 (2006), pp.292-311.

Craigie, P., The Problem of War in the Old Testament (Grand Rapids: W.B. Eerdmans, 1978).

Creach, J.F.D., Joshua (Interpretation: A Bible Commentary for Teaching and Preaching) (Louisville: John Knox Press, 2003).

Cross, F.M., Canaanite Myth and Hebrew Epic: Essays in the History of the Religion of Israel (Cambridge MA: Harvard University Press, 1973).

Daniélou, J., From Glory to Glory: Texts from Gregory of Nyssa's mystical writings (London: John Murray, ET:1962).

Davies, D.J., Anthropology and Theology (Oxford: Berg, 2002).

Davis, E.F., 'Critical Traditioning: Seeking an Inner Biblical Hermeneutic' in ATR 82:4 (2000), pp.733-751.

Dawson, J.D., Christian Figural Reading and the Fashioning of Identity (Berkeley: University of California Press, 2002).

De Troyer, K., (Rewriting the Sacred Text: What the Old Greek Texts tell us about the Literary Growth of the Bible (Atlanta: SBL, 2003).

Dever, W.G., What did the Biblical Writers know and when did they know it? What Archaeology can tell us about the Reality of Ancient Israel (Grand Rapids: W.B. Eerdmans, 2002).

Doty, W.G., Mythography: The Study of Myths and Rituals (Tuscaloosa: University of Alabama Press, 2nd ed. 2000).

Douglas, M., (Purity and Danger (London: Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1966).

Driver, S.R., A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on Deuteronomy (The International Critical Commentary) (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 3rd ed. 1902).

Drucker, R., The Book of Joshua: A New Translation with a Commentary anthologized from Talmudic, Midrashic and Rabbinic Sources (New York: Mesorah Publications, 1982).

Dube, M.W., 'Rahab says Hello to Judith: A Decolonizing Feminist Reading', in R.S. Sugirtharajah (ed.), The Postcolonial Biblical Reader (Oxford: Blackwell, 2006), pp.142-158.

Dupré, L., Symbols of the Sacred (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2000).

Durham, J.I., Exodus (Word Biblical Commentary 3) (Dallas: Word, 1987).

Edinger, E., The Bible and the Psyche: Individuation Symbolism in the Old Testament (Toronto: Inner City Books, 1986).

Faye, J-P., in 'Claude Lévi-Strauss: A Confrontation', in New Left Review 1/62 (Jul-Aug 1970), pp.57-74.

Fensham, F.C., 'The Treaty between Israel and the Gibeonites' in BA 27/3 (1964), pp.96-100.

Fishbane, M., Biblical Interpretation in Ancient Israel (Oxford: Clarendon, corr. ed. 1985).

Fleming, C., René Girard: Violence and Mimesis (Cambridge: Polity Press, 2004).

Fleming, D.E., 'The Seven-Day Siege of Jericho in Holy War' in R.Chazan (et al) (eds), Ki Baruch Hu: Ancient Near Eastern, Biblical and Judaic Studies in honour of Baruch A. Levine (Winona Lake: Eisenbrauns, 1999), pp.211-228.

Ford, W.A., God, Pharaoh and Moses: Explaining the Lord's Actions in the Exodus Plagues Narrative (Paternoster Biblical Monographs) (Bletchley: Paternoster, 2006).

Fretheim, T.E., Exodus (Interpretation: A Bible Commentary for Teaching and Preaching) (Louisville: John Knox Press, 1991).

Fritz, V., Das Buch Josua (HAT I/7) (Tübingen: J.C.B. Mohr (Paul Siebeck), 1994).

Gerstenberger, E.S., Leviticus (Louisville: WJKP, ET:1996).

Gevirtz, S., 'Jericho and Shechem: A Religio-literary Aspect of City Destruction', in VT 13 (1963), pp.52-62.

Goldingay, J., Old Testament Theology (Downers Grove: IVP, 3 vols., 2003-).

Gottwald, N.K., The Tribes of Yahweh: A Sociology of the Religion of Liberated Israel, 1250-1050 BCE (The Biblical Seminar 66) (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1999).

Green, W.S., 'Romancing the Tome: Rabbinic Hermeneutics and the Theory of Literature', in Semeia 40 (1987), pp.147-168.

Grintz, J.M., 'The Treaty of Joshua with the Gibeonites' in JAOS 86/2 (1966), pp.113-126.

Gundry, S.N. (ed.), Show them no Mercy: 4 Views on God and Canaanite Genocide (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 2003).

Gunn, D.M., 'The "Hardening of Pharaoh's Heart": Plot, Character and Theology in Exodus 1-14', in D.J.A. Clines (et al) (eds), Art and Meaning: Rhetoric in Biblical Literature, (JSOTSup 19), (Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1982), pp.72-96.

Güterbock, H.G., 'The Deeds of Suppiluliuma as Told by His Son, Muršilli II', in JCS 10 (1956), pp. 41-130.

Haak, R.D., 'Altar', in ABD vol.1, pp.162-167.

Habel, N.C., The Land is Mine: Six Biblical Land Ideologies (Overtures to Biblical Theology) (Minneapolis: Fortress Press, 1995).

Halpern, B., 'Gibeon:Israelite Diplomacy in the Conquest Era', in CBQ 37 (1975), pp.303-316.

Hallo, W.W., 'New Light on the Story of Achsah', in J.Kaltner & L.Stulman (eds), Inspired Speech: Prophecy in the Ancient Near East. Essays in honour of Herbert. B. Huffmon (London: T&T Clark, 2004), pp.330-335.

‘ḥarāmu’, in CAD vol.6 ‘ḥ’, pp.89-90.

Hawk, L.D., Every Promise Fulfilled: Contesting Plots in Joshua (Louisville: Westminster John Knox Press, 1991).

_____, Joshua (Berit Olam: Studies in Hebrew Narrative and Poetry) (Collegeville: The Liturgical Press, 2000).

Heisig, J.W., ‘Symbolism’ in M. Eliade (ed.), The Encyclopedia of Religion (New York: Simon & Schuster Macmillan), vol. 13, pp.198-208.

Hervieu-Léger, D., Religion as a Chain of Memory (New Brunswick: Rutgers UP, ET:2000).

Hess, R.S., Joshua (Tyndale Old Testament Commentaries) (Leicester: IVP, 1996).

Hoffman, Y., ‘The Deuteronomistic Concept of the Herem’, in ZAW 111 (1999), pp.196-210.

Holland, T.A., & Netzer, E., ‘Jericho (place)’, in ABD, vol. 3 pp.723-740.

Hurvitz, A., A Linguistic Study of the Relationship between the Priestly Source and the Book of Ezekiel: A New Approach to an Old Problem (Cahiers de la Revue Biblique 20) (Paris: J. Gabalda, 1982).

James, P., et al, (Centuries of Darkness (London: Pimlico, 1992).

Jobling, D., ‘The Jordan as a Boundary’: Transjordan in Israel’s Ideological Geography’, in The Sense of Biblical Narrative: Structural Analyses in the Hebrew Bible II (JSOTSup 39) (Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1986), pp.88-134.

Kallai, Z., ‘The Land of the Perizzites and the Rephaim (Joshua 17,14-18)’, in C. Brekelmans & J. Lust (eds), Pentateuchal and Deuteronomistic Studies: Papers read at the XIIIth IOSOT Congress Leuven 1989 (Leuven: Leuven UP, 1990), pp.197-205.

Kaminsky, J.S., ‘Joshua 7: A Reassessment of the Israelite Conceptions of Corporate Punishment’, in S.W. Holloway & L.K. Handy (eds.), The Pitcher is Broken: Memorial Essays for Gösta W. Ahlström (JSOTSup 190) (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1995), pp.315-346.

Kang, S-M., Divine War in the Old Testament and in the Ancient Near East (BZAW 177) (Berlin: Walter de Gruyter, 1989).

Kearney, P.J., ‘The Role of the Gibeonites in the Deuteronomistic History’, in CBQ 35 (1973), pp.1-19.

Kent, B., 'Augustine's Ethics', in E. Stump & N. Kretzmann (eds), The Cambridge Companion to Augustine (Cambridge: CUP, 2001), pp.205-233.

Kerr, F., Theology after Wittgenstein (London: SPCK, 2nd ed. 1997).

Kilmer, A.D., 'The Mesopotamian Counterparts of the Biblical Nephilim', in E.W. Conrad & E.G. Newing (eds) Perspectives on Language and Text (Winona Lake: Eisenbrauns, 1987), pp.39-44.

Kirk, A., 'Social and Cultural Memory', in A. Kirk & T. Thatcher (eds), Memory, Tradition, and Text: Uses of the Past in Early Christianity (Semeia Studies 52) (Atlanta: SBL, 2005), pp.1-24.

Kitchen, K.A., On the Reliability of the Old Testament (Grand Rapids: W.B. Eerdmans, 2003).

Kloppenbeorg, J.S., 'Joshua 22: The Priestly editing of an Ancient Tradition', in Biblica 62 (1981), pp.347- 371.

Koehler, L., and Baumgartner, W., The Hebrew and Aramaic Lexicon of the Old Testament (Leiden: Brill, rev. ed. 1994-2000).

Koopmans, W.T., Joshua 24 as Poetic Narrative (JSOTSup 93) (Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1990).

Kratz, R.G., The Composition of the Narrative Books of the Old Testament (London: T & T Clark, ET: 2005).

Kunin, S.D., We Think What We Eat: Neo-structuralist analysis of Israelite Food Rules and Other Cultural and Textual Practices (JSOTSup 412: London: T&T Clark, 2004).

Lacocque, A., 'The Land in D and P', in M. Augustin & K.D. Schunck (eds), "Dort ziehen Schiffe dahin ...": Collected Communications to the XIVth Congress of the International Organization for the Study of the Old Testament, Paris 1992 (Frankfurt: Peter Lang, 1996), pp.91-100.

Laird, M., Gregory of Nyssa and the Grasp of Faith: Union, Knowledge and Divine Presence (Oxford Early Christian Studies) (Oxford: OUP, 2004).

Lash, N., 'What might Martyrdom mean?', in Theology on the Way to Emmaus (London: SCM, 1986), pp.75-92.

Lawson Younger K., Jr., Ancient Conquest Accounts: A Study in Ancient Near Eastern and Biblical History Writing (JSOTSup 98) (Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1990).

Leach, E., 'Fishing for Men on the Edge of the Wilderness' in R. Alter & F. Kermode, The Complete Literary Guide to the Bible (Cambridge: Harvard UP, 1987), pp.579-599.

Levenson, J.D., Creation and the Persistence of Evil (Princeton: Princeton UP, 1988).

Levine, B.A., & De Tarragon, J-M., ('Dead Kings and Rephaim: The Patrons of the Ugaritic Dynasty', in JAOS 104/4 (1984), pp.649-659.

Levine, B.A., Numbers 1-20 (The Anchor Bible vol. 4a) (New York: Doubleday, 1993).

Lévi-Strauss, C., 'The Structural Study of Myth' in The Journal of American Folklore vol. 68, No. 270 (Oct.-Dec. 1955), pp.428-444.

_____, in 'Claude Lévi-Strauss: A Confrontation', in New Left Review 1/62 (Jul-Aug 1970), pp.57-74.

_____, From Honey to Ashes (New York: Harper and Row, ET:1973).

Liver, J., 'The Literary History of Joshua IX', in JSS 8 (1963), pp.227-243.

Lohfink, N., 'ḥāram' in TDOT V, pp.180-199.

Loomba, A., Colonialism/Postcolonialism (New Critical Idiom) (London: Routledge, 2nd ed. 2005).

MacDonald, N.B., Karl Barth and the Strange New World within the Bible: Barth, Wittgenstein, and the Metadilemmas of the Enlightenment (Paternoster Biblical and Theological Monographs) (Carlisle: Paternoster, 2000).

Malinowski, B., 'Myth in Primitive Psychology' in Magic, Science and Religion and other Essays (Westport: Greenwood Press, 1984), pp.93-148.

Margalit, B., 'The Day the Sun did not stand still: A new look at Joshua X 8-15', in VT 42:4 (1992), pp.466-491.

Marr, A., 'Violence and the Kingdom of God: Introducing the Anthropology of René Girard', in ATR 80:4 (1998), pp.590-603.

Matties, G., 'Can Girard help us to read Joshua?', in W.M. Swartley, Violence Renounced: René Girard, Biblical Studies, and peacemaking (Telford: Pandora Press, 2000), pp.85-102.

Mattingly, G.L., 'Anak', in ABD, vol. 1, p.222.

Mbuwayesango, D., 'Joshua' in D. Patte (ed), Global Bible Commentary (Nashville: Abingdon Press, 2004), pp.64-73.

McCarthy, D.J., 'The Theology of Leadership in Joshua 1-9', in Biblica 52 (1981), pp.165-175.

McConville, G., 'Joshua', in J. Barton & J. Muddiman (eds), The Oxford Bible Commentary (Oxford: OUP, 2001).

McFague, S., Metaphorical Theology: Models of God in Religious Language (Philadelphia: Fortress Press, 1982).

Mendenhall, G.E., 'Amorites', in ABD, vol. 1, pp.199-202.

Meredith, A., The Cappadocians (Crestwood: St. Vladimir's Seminary Press, 2000).

Merling, D., Sr., The Book of Joshua: Its Theme and Role in Archaeological Discussions (Andrews University Seminary Doctoral Dissertation Series 23) (Berrien Springs: Andrews University Press, 1997).

Milgrom, J., 'Priestly ("P") Source' in ABD, vol.5, pp.454-461.

_____, Leviticus 23-27 (The Anchor Bible 3B) (New York: Doubleday, 2000).

Miller, D., On Nationality (Oxford: OUP, 1995).

Miller, P.D., The Divine Warrior in early Israel (Harvard Semitic Monographs 5) (Cambridge: Harvard UP, 1973).

Mitchell, G., Together in the Land: A Reading of the Book of Joshua (JSOTSup 134) (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1993).

Moberly, R.W.L., The Bible, Theology and Faith (Cambridge Studies in Christian Doctrine) (Cambridge: CUP, 2000).

Mosca, P.G., 'Who Seduced Whom? A Note on Joshua 15:18//Judges 1:14', in CBQ 46 (1984), pp.18-22.

Murray, P.D., 'Theology 'Under the Lash': Theology as Idolatry-Critique in the Work of Nicholas Lash', in S.C. Barton (ed), Idolatry: False Worship in the Bible, Early Judaism and Christianity (London: T&T Clark, 2007), pp. 246-266.

Nelson, R.D., 'Josiah in the Book of Joshua', in JBL 100/4 (1981), pp.531-540.

_____, 'herem and the Deuteronomic Social Conscience', in J. Lust & M. Vervenne (eds.), Deuteronomy and Deuteronomic Literature: Festschrift C.H.W. Brekelmans (Peeters, 1997), pp.39-54.

_____, Joshua (The Old Testament Library) (Louisville: Westminster John Knox Press, 1997).

Niditch, S., War in the Hebrew Bible (Oxford: OUP, 1993).

Noll, K.L., 'Deuteronomistic History or Deuteronomic Debate? (A thought experiment)', in JSOT 31:3 (2007), pp.311-345.

Northup, L.A., 'Myth-placed Priorities: Religion and the study of Myth' in Religious Studies Review 32:1 (2006), pp.5-10.

Noth, M., Leviticus (Old Testament Library) (London: SCM, Rev. ET: 1977).

_____, The Deuteronomistic History, (JSOTSup 15) (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, ET: 1981).

Pannenberg, W., 'Dogmatic Theses on the Concept of Revelation', in W Pannenberg (ed), Revelation as History (London: Sheed & Ward, 1969) pp.123-158.

Parry, R., Old Testament Story and Christian Ethics: The Rape of Dinah as a Case Study (Paternoster Biblical Monographs) (Bletchley: Paternoster, 2004).

Park, H.D., Finding Herem? A Study of Luke-Acts in the Light of Herem (Library of New Testament Studies 357) (London: T&T Clark, 2007).

Peckham, B., 'The Composition of Joshua 3-4', in CBQ 46 (1984), pp.413-431.

Penelhum, T., 'The Analysis of Faith in St. Thomas Aquinas', in Religious Studies 13/2 (1977), pp.133-154.

Polzin, R., Moses and the Deuteronomist: A Literary Study of the Deuteronomistic History (New York: Seabury Press, 1980).

Prior, M.A., The Bible and Colonialism: A Moral Critique (The Biblical Seminar 48) (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1997).

Ramsey, G.W., 'If Jericho was not Razed, is our Faith in Vain?' in The Quest for the Historical Israel: Reconstructing Israel's Early History, (London: SCM, 1982).

Ratheiser, G.M.H., Mitzvoth Ethics and the Jewish Bible: The End of Old Testament Theology (London: T&T Clark, 2007).

Ricoeur, P., The Symbolism of Evil (Boston: Beacon Press, ET: 1969).

_____, in 'Claude Lévi-Strauss: A Confrontation', in New Left Review 1/62 (Jul-Aug 1970), pp.57-74.

_____, 'Biblical Hermeneutics', in Semeia 4 (1975), pp.29-148.

_____, Interpretation Theory: Discourse and the Surplus of Meaning (Fort Worth: The Texan Christian UP, 1976).

_____, 'The Narrative Function', in Semeia 13 (1978), pp.177-202.

_____, 'The Hermeneutics of Testimony', in P. Ricoeur (ed. L.S. Mudge), Essays on Biblical Interpretation (London: SPCK, 1981), pp.119-154.

_____, 'Toward a Hermeneutic of the Idea of Revelation', in P. Ricoeur (ed. L.S. Mudge), Essays on Biblical Interpretation (London: SPCK, 1981), pp.73-118.

_____, 'Biblical Time', in Figuring The Sacred (Minneapolis: Fortress Press, 1995), pp.167-180.

_____, 'Naming God', in Figuring the Sacred (Minneapolis: Fortress Press, 1995), pp.217-235.

_____, 'Toward a Narrative Theology: Its Necessity, Its Resources, Its Difficulties', in Figuring the Sacred (Minneapolis: Fortress Press, 1995), pp.236-248.

Rist, J., 'Faith and Reason', in E. Stump & N. Kretzmann (eds), The Cambridge Companion to Augustine (Cambridge: CUP, 2001), pp.26-39.

Rofé, A., 'The Editing of the Book of Joshua in the light of 4QJosh^a', in G.J. Brooke (ed.), New Qumran Texts and Studies: Proceedings of the first Meeting of the International Organization for Qumran Studies, Paris, 1992 (Leiden: E.J. Brill, 1994), pp.73-80.

Rogerson, J.W., Myth in Old Testament Interpretation (BZAW 134) (New York: Walter de Gruyter, 1974).

_____, 'Towards a Communicative Theology of the Old Testament', in J.G. McConville & K. Möller (eds.), Reading the Law: Studies in Honour of Gordon J. Wenham (London: T&T Clark, 2007), pp.283-296.

Römer, T.C., & de Pury, A., 'Deuteronomistic Historiography: History of Research and related Issues', in A. de Pury (et al) (eds), Israel Constructs its History: Deuteronomistic Historiography in Recent Research (JSOTSup 306) (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2000), pp.24-141.

Römer, T.C., The So-Called Deuteronomistic History: A Sociological, Historical and Literary Introduction (London: T&T Clark, 2005).

Rowlett, L.L., 'Inclusion, Exclusion and Marginality in the Book of Joshua', in JSOT 55 (1992), pp.15-23.

_____, Joshua and the Rhetoric of Violence: A New Historicist Analysis (JSOTSup 226) (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1996).

Sarna, N.M., Exploring Exodus: The Origins of Biblical Israel (New York: Schocken Books, 1996).

Schäfer-Lichtenberger, C., 'Bedeutung und Funktion von Herem in biblisch-hebräischen Texten', in BZ 38 (1994), pp.270-275.

Schneiders, S.M., The Revelatory Text (Collegeville: The Liturgical Press, 2nd ed. 1999).

Schwienhorst, L., Die Eroberung Jerichos: Exegetische Untersuchung zu Josua 6 (Stuttgart: Katholisches Bibelwerk, 1986).

Segal, R.A., review of Mythography: The Study of Myths and Rituals (Tuscaloosa: University of Alabama Press, 1986), by W.G. Doty, in JAAR 56 (1988), pp.149-152.

_____, Theorizing about Myth (Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1999).

_____, Myth: A Very Short Introduction (Oxford: OUP, 2004).

Seward, D., The Monks of War: The Military Religious Orders (London: Eyre Methuen, 1972).

Sherwood, A., 'A Leader's Misleading and a Prostitute's Profession: A Re-examination of Joshua 2', in JSOT 31/1 (2006), pp.43-61.

Smelik, K.A.D., 'Moabite Inscriptions' in CoS II, pp.137-138.

Snaith, N.H., 'The Altar at Gilgal: Joshua XXII 23-29', in VT 28/3 (1978), pp.330-335.

Soggie, N.A., Myth, God, and War: The Mythopoetic Inspiration of Joshua (Lanham: University Press of America, 2007).

Soggin, J.A., Joshua (Old Testament Library) (London: SCM Press, ET: 1972).

Southern, R.W., 'The Sovereign Textbook of the Schools: the Bible' in Scholastic Humanism and the Unification of Europe (Oxford: Blackwell, 1995), vol. 1.

Spina, F.A., The Faith of the Outsider: Exclusion and Inclusion in the Biblical Story (Grand Rapids: W.B. Eerdmans, 2005).

Stec, D.M., 'The Mantle Hidden by Achan', in VT 41/3 (1991), pp.356-359.

Stern, P.D., (The Biblical herem: A Window on Israel's Religious Experience (Brown Judaic Studies 211) (Atlanta: Scholar's Press, 1991).

Stevenson, W.T., 'History as Myth: Some Implications for History and Theology', in Cross Currents 20:1 (1970), pp.15-28.

Stone, L.G., 'Ethical and Apologetic Tendencies in the Redaction of the Book of Joshua', in CBQ 53 (1991), pp.25-36.

Strange, J., 'The Book of Joshua – Origin and Dating', in SJOT 16/1 (2002), pp.44-51.

Sutherland, R.K., 'Israelite Political Theories in Joshua 9', in JSOT 53 (1992), pp.65-74.

Szpek, H.M., 'Achshah's Story: A Metaphor for Societal Transition', in AUSS 40/2 (2002), pp.245-256.

Tamarin, G.R., The Israeli Dilemma: Essays on a Warfare State (Rotterdam: Rotterdam University Press, 1973).

Thompson, L.L., 'The Jordan Crossing: šidqot Yahweh and World building', in JBL 100/3 (1981), pp.343-358.

Tolkien, J.R.R., 'On Fairy Stories', in Essays presented to Charles Williams (London: OUP, 1947), pp.38-89.

Thunberg, L., Microcosm and Mediator: The Theological Anthropology of Maximus the Confessor (Chicago: Open Court, 2nd ed. 1995).

Tov, E., 'Midrash-type Exegesis in the LXX of Joshua', in Revue Biblique 85 (1978), pp.50-61.

Turner, V., 'Myth and Symbol', in D.L. Sills (ed.), International Encyclopedia of the Social Sciences (Macmillan & The Free Press, 1968), vol.10, pp.576-581.

_____, From Ritual to Theatre: The Human Seriousness of Play (New York: PAJ, 1982).

van der Meer, M.N., Formation and Reformulation: The Redaction of the Book of Joshua in the Light of the oldest Textual Witnesses (Leiden: Brill, 2004).

Vanhoozer, K., Biblical Narrative in the Philosophy of Paul Ricoeur (Cambridge: CUP, 1990).

van Seters, J., 'Joshua's Campaign of Canaan and Near Eastern Historiography', in SJOT 4 (1990), pp.1-12.

_____, In Search of History: Historiography in the Ancient World and the Origins of Biblical History (Winona Lake: Eisenbrauns, 1997).

von Hendy, A., The Modern Construction of Myth (Bloomington: Indiana UP, 2002).

von Rad, G., Old Testament Theology, Volume II: The Theology of Israel's Prophetic Traditions (London: SCM, ET:1965).

_____, 'The Form-critical problem of the Hexateuch', in The Problem of the Hexateuch and other Essays (London: SCM, ET: 1966), pp.1-78.

_____, Holy War in Ancient Israel (Grand Rapids: W.B. Eerdmans, ET:1991).

Waardenburg, J., 'Symbolic Aspects of Myth' in A.M. Olson (ed.), Myth, Symbol and Reality (Notre Dame: University of Notre Dame Press, 1980), pp.41-68.

Wallace, M.I. The Second Naiveté: Barth, Ricoeur, and the New Yale Theology (Studies in American Biblical Hermeneutics 6) (Georgia: Mercer UP, 1990).

Walsh, R.G., Mapping Myths of Biblical Interpretation (Playing the Texts 4) (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2001).

Waltke, B.K., & O'Connor, M., An Introduction to Biblical Hebrew Syntax (Winona Lake: Eisenbrauns, 1990).

Warrior, R.A., 'Canaanites, Cowboys and Indians: Deliverance, Conquest, and Liberation Theology Today' in D. Jobling, et al. (eds), The Postmodern Bible Reader (Oxford: Blackwell, 2001), pp.188-194.

Weinfeld, M., Deuteronomy and the Deuteronomistic School (Oxford: Clarendon, 1972).

_____, 'Divine Intervention in War in Ancient Israel and in the Ancient Near East', in H. Tadmor & M. Weinfeld (eds), History, Historiography and Interpretation: Studies in biblical and cuneiform literatures (Jerusalem: The Magnes Press, 1984), pp.121-147.

_____, The Promise of the Land: The Inheritance of the Land of Canaan by the Israelites (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1993).

Weingreen, J., 'The Case of the Daughters of Zelophchad', in VT 16/4 (1966), pp.518-522.

Wenham, G.J., 'The Deuteronomistic Theology of the Book of Joshua', in JBL 90/2 (1971), pp.140-148.

Williams, R., 'The Judgement of the World', in On Christian Theology (Oxford: Blackwell, 2000), pp.29-43.

_____, 'Trinity and Revelation' in On Christian Theology (Oxford: Blackwell, 2000), pp.131-147.

Williams, R.B., 'Origen's Interpretation of the Old Testament and Lévi-Strauss' Interpretation of Myth', in A.L. Merrill & T.W. Overholt (eds), Scripture in History & Theology: Essays in Honor of J. Coert Rylaarsdam (PTMS 17) (Pittsburgh: The Pickwick Press, 1977), pp.279-299.

Wilson, R.R., 'The Hardening of Pharaoh's Heart' in CBQ 41 (1979), pp.18-36.

Wittgenstein, L., Ludwig Wittgenstein: Lectures and Conversations on Aesthetics, Psychology and Religious Belief (Oxford: Blackwell, 1966).

Woudstra, M.H., The Book of Joshua (New International Commentary on the Old Testament) (Grand Rapids: W.B. Eerdmans, 1981).

Young, F.M., Biblical Exegesis and the Formation of Christian Culture (Cambridge: CUP, 1997).

Zaharopoulos, D., Theodore of Mopsuestia on the Bible: A Study of his Old Testament Exegesis (New York: Paulist Press, 1989).

Primary texts and translations

Battles, F.L., Calvin: Institutes of the Christian Religion, (The Library of Christian Classics 20) (Philadelphia: The Westminster Press, 2 vols., 1960).

Beveridge, H., (trans.), Commentaries on the Book of Joshua by John Calvin, (Grand Rapids: W.B. Eerdmans, 1949).

Bruce, B.J., (trans.), Origen, Homilies on Joshua (The Fathers of the Church 105) (Washington: The Catholic University of America Press, 2002).

Butterworth, G.W., (trans), Origen: On First Principles (Gloucester: Peter Smith, 1973).

Daley, B.E., (trans.), Gregory of Nazianzus (The Early Church Fathers) (Routledge, New ed.: 2000).

Elliger, K., and Rudolph, W., (eds.) Biblia Hebraica Stuttgartensia (Stuttgart: Deutsche Bibelgesellschaft, 4th ed. 1990).

Franke, J.R., (ed.), Ancient Christian Commentary on Scripture, Old Testament IV: Joshua, Judges, Ruth, 1-2 Samuel (Downers Grove: IVP, 2005).

Gilby, T., (ed.), Summa Theologiae, Latin text and English Translation (Blackfriars ed.) (London: Eyre & Spottiswoode, 60 vols., 1964-1974).

Graef, H.C., (trans), St. Gregory of Nyssa: The Lord's Prayer, The Beatitudes (ACW 18) (New York: Paulist Press, 1954).

Hall, S.G., & Moriarty, R., (trans) 'Gregory, Bishop of Nyssa: Homilies on Ecclesiastes', in Gregory of Nyssa: Homilies on Ecclesiastes: An English Version with Supporting Studies (Berlin: Walter de Gruyter, 1993), pp.31-144.

Hill, R.C., (trans.), Theodoret of Cyrus, 'Questions on Joshua' in The Questions on the Octateuch (The Library of early Christianity vol. 2) (Washington, The Catholic University of America Press, 2007), pp.260-307.

Ferguson, E., & Malherbe, A.J., (trans.), Gregory of Nyssa, The Life of Moses (The Classics of Western Spirituality) (New York: Paulist Press, 1978).

Freedman, B.A., & Simon, M., Midrash Rabbah translated into English with notes, glossary and indices under the editorship of Rabbi Dr. H. Freedman, B.A., PH.D. and Maurice Simon, M.A., (London: The Soncino Press, 10 vols., 1939).

Lombardo, G.J., (trans.), St. Augustine: On Faith and Works (ACW 48) (New York: The Newman Press, 1988).

Lull, T.F., (trans.), Luther, The Freedom of a Christian, in Basic Theological Writings (Minneapolis: Fortress Press, 1989), pp.585-629.

McKenna, S., (trans.), Saint Augustine: The Trinity (The Fathers of the Church 45) (Washington: The Catholic University of America Press, 1963).

Neusner, J., (trans.), Mekhilta according to Rabbi Ishmael: An Analytic Translation (Brown Judaica Studies 148, Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1988), vol. 1.

O'Mara, V., & Paul, S., (eds), A Repertorium of Middle English Prose Sermons (SERMO: Studies on Patristic, Medieval and Reformation Sermons and Preaching) (Turnhout: Brepols, 4 vols., 2007)

Pritchard, J.B., (ed.), Ancient Near Eastern Texts Relating to the Old Testament 3rd ed. with supplement (Princeton, Princeton University Press, 1969).

Roberts, A., & Donaldson, J. (eds), Constitutions of the Holy Apostles, in ANF 7.

_____, (eds), Irenaeus: Against Heresies, in ANF 1.

Schaff, P., (ed.), Augustine, On Christian Doctrine, in NPNF 1.2.

_____, Gregory of Nazianzus: Theological Orations, in NPNF II.7.

